Enes Bayraklı
Mr. Bayraklı earned his BA, MA and PhD from the Department of Political Science at the University of Vienna, and conducted research for his PhD thesis at the University of Nottingham in Britain between 2009 and 2010. He took office as a deputy director at Yunus Emre Turkish Cultural Center in London in 2011-2013. Mr. Bayraklı also served as the founding director of Yunus Emre Turkish Cultural Centers in Constanța and Bucharest during the period of August-December 2012. Mr. Bayraklı has been a faculty member in the Department of Political Science at the Turkish-German University since 2013. His fields of research include the Transformation of Turkish Foreign Policy, Cultural Diplomacy, Foreign Policy Analysis, German Politics and Foreign Policy. bayrakli@tau.edu.tr

Farid Hafez
Farid Hafez is Visiting Professor of International Studies at Williams College and non-resident senior researcher at Georgetown University’s “The Bridge Initiative” at the School of Foreign Service. He defended his habilitation thesis entitled “Islam-Politics in the Second Republic of Austria” at the University of Salzburg in 2019. In 2017, he was a Fulbright visiting professor at the University of California, Berkeley and in 2014, he was a visiting scholar at Columbia University, New York. Since 2010 he has been the editor of Islamophobia Studies Yearbook, and since 2016 the co-editor of European Islamophobia Report. Hafez has received the Bruno Kreisky Award for the “Political Book of the Year” for his anthology Islamophobia in Austria (co-edited with John Bunzl). He has more than 120 publications in leading journals such as Politics and Religion, Patterns of Prejudice, and German Politics and Society. His latest publications are Islamophobia in Muslim Majority Societies (Routledge, co-edited with Enes Bayraklı, 2019) and Feindbild Islam. Über die Salonfähigkeit von Rassismus (Islamophobia. On the Mainstreaming of Racism) (Böhlau, 2019). Email: fh6@williams.edu

We are pleased to present to you the sixth consecutive edition of the European Islamophobia Report (EIR) covering the year 2020. For this edition, 37 colleagues from the academic world and civil society have contributed to the coverage of 31 European countries. As in the past years, we have highlighted the developments of Islamophobia in key fields such as employment, education, media including the internet, the legal system, and politics. As usual, the authors of this year’s country reports have provided their valuable country-specific policy recommendations to counter this phenomenon and a detailed chronology of events. The EIR continues to provide policymakers, scholars, community leaders, and ordinary readers a unique collection of European-wide analyses of anti-Muslim racism in Europe.

We are pleased to continue this project with new cooperation partners. First and foremost, we are happy to have the support of the International Islamophobia Studies and Research Association (IISRA) based in Berkeley, California. The IISRA is the first academic institution of its kind, bringing together numerous academic institutions and scholars who have been working on Islamophobia around the globe for more than a decade. We would also like to thank the Othering & Belonging Institute at the University of California, Berkeley, Rutgers University’s Center for Security, Race and Rights, the Berkeley-based International Islamophobia Studies Center, the Islamophobia Research and Documentation Project (IRDP) at the Center for Race and Gender (CRG) at the University of California, Berkeley, the Arab and Muslim Ethnicities and Diasporas (AMED) Studies program at San Francisco State University, and last but not least, the Vienna-based Leopold Weiss Institute. We feel that this academic framework is an ideal fit for the work that we have accomplished with the EIR in the last years.
Looking back at the last six years, many observers will unanimously agree that the state of Islamophobia in Europe not only has not improved, but has worsened, if not reached a tipping point. This is also one of the reasons why we chose the image of a politician for the front cover of this year’s edition - a politician who is widely regarded as representing a centrist and mainstream political movement. This very fact serves as a further revelation that the center has become more extreme in relation to Islamophobia. French and Austrian Muslims have been left in the hands of brutal state violence that has been legitimized in the name of counterterrorism laws. The closure of the French monitoring body Collectif contre l’islamophobie en France (CCIF, Collective Against Islamophobia in France) is an example of how far state Islamophobia has developed.

These new developments warrant making the daily reality of Islamophobia visible with a greater urgency than ever before, and urge us not to be silent in the face of the increasing pressure on the human rights of Muslims in Europe and beyond.

The Editors
The year 2020 was shaped globally by the COVID-19 pandemic which also spread widely in Europe. As of mid-March, and again in mid-October, the WHO considered Europe the pandemic’s most active center. The pandemic had quite different effects on the role of Islamophobia. On the one hand, in some countries, with the forced retreat of everyday life to the intimate private sphere, physical Islamophobia has decreased. Yet, at the same time, Islamophobia has moved to the private sphere and is being spread especially in social media. A report by the Anti-Muslim Hatred Working Group in the UK and several authors in our report suggest this. Especially with the outbreak of the pandemic in Europe, the world watched how images of Islam and Muslims were linked to the pandemic - be it in mainstream magazines like The Economist, where articles were quickly taken down, or the New York Times.

Authors of EIR 2020 report that with the numerous lockdowns imposed by authorities and the shutting down of daily life as people knew it before the outbreak of the pandemic, 2020 saw a decrease in Islamophobia and anti-Muslim attacks. Conversely, other authors report that the anti-Muslim hate crimes did not decrease as documentation in some countries reveals. According to the author of the German report, Soner Tauscher, 901 Islamophobic crimes were committed across Germany in 2020, 146 of which targeted mosques and 48 of which targeted people. At the same time, anti-Muslim social movements organized their rallies in spite of the pandemic.

PEGIDA held at least 16 rallies in 2020 next to several other protests by other local initiatives. Other authors show that the pandemic has drowned out public debate on prejudice, social divisions, and hate crime.

This short glimpse into Islamophobia in 2020 reveals the ongoing necessity for reporting Islamophobia. The EIR 2020 includes a general assessment of Islamophobia in Europe in 2020 and 31 country reports that include almost all EU member states and additional countries such as Russia, Albania, Bosnia Herzegovina, Serbia, Kosovo, North Macedonia, and Montenegro. The EIR 2020 has brought together 36 scholars, experts, and civil society activists from various European countries who are specialized on racism and Islamophobia studies. They cover various issues from media, politics, and the justice system to the Internet, and offer concrete policy recommendations for civil society and politics. As our audience grows to include practitioners, scholars, and the general public, our website has acquired a global audience, and the EIR and its findings have been cited frequently by international organizations, politicians, NGOs, scholars, and local and international media outlets. Indeed, the findings of the EIR have been cited more than 250 times in academic articles or books. Since 2016, the EIR is also a regional contributor to the Annual Hate Crime DATA by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), which monitors and report hate crimes in the OSCE region.

The year 2020 was an eventful year for Islamophobic developments, even setting the global spread of COVID-19 aside. The cover of this year’s report shows French President Emmanuel Macron, who have severely cracked down on Muslim civil society and anti-racist activists and scholars in France. With the “Law Confirming the Principles of the Republic” (originally entitled “Law against Separatism”), the Macron government further institutionalized Islamophobia and adopted an authoritarian style. France witnessed an increasing number of police searches, threats of eviction, as well as mosques and school closures, including the dissolution of a humanitarian NGO and a human rights organization defending Muslims in France against racism and discrimination. All together these threatened the fundamental freedoms of Muslims, in specific, and more broadly reveal a shift towards a restriction of citizens’ rights and freedoms. France has arrived at a state where the French interior minister Gérald Darmanin even singled out the long-time Islamophobic far-right party leader Marine Le Pen for “being too soft on Islam.”6 Similarly, in Austria a raid against proponents of alleged “political Islam” was made one week after the murderous attack on November 2 in Vienna. The home of several civil society activists were also raided and their bank accounts and assets were frozen on the suspicion of being terrorists that want to topple the Egyptian regime, destroy Israel, and create a worldwide caliphate.7 The raid was based on a report written by Lorenzo Vidino that argues that Islamophobia is a combat term used by political Islamists “to foster a siege mentality within local Muslim communities, arguing that the government and Western societies are hostile to them and Islam in general.” Hafez had already criticized this report as a method used in a systematic way to “produce knowledge to define vocal and representative actors of the Muslim civil society as potentially radical and Islamist, which then should lead to state and civil society exclusion.”

What Is Islamophobia?

There are numerous definitions of Islamophobia which are influenced by different theoretical approaches such as racism and prejudice studies or decolonial perspectives. As we have outlined already in the first edition of the EIR in 2015, we use a working definition of Islamophobia that theorizes Islamophobia as anti-Muslim racism. “When talking about Islamophobia, we mean anti-Muslim racism. […] Islamophobia is about a dominant group of people aiming at seizing, stabilizing and widening their power by means of defining a scapegoat – real or invented – and excluding this scapegoat from the resources/rights/definition of a constructed ‘we’. Islamophobia operates by constructing a static ‘Muslim’ identity, which is attributed in negative terms and generalized for all Muslims. At the same time, Islamophobic images are fluid and vary in different contexts, because Islamophobia tells us more about the Islamophobe than it tells us about the Muslims/Islam.”

With this working definition, we focus on the power structures and with it the marginalization and injustices stemming from power structures. When we record and write about Islamophobia or anti-Muslim racism in this report, it is to problematize exclusionary and dehumanizing structures that are manifested in the ways we conceive the world and the place of Muslims and Islam therein today, as well as acts that represent this exclusion and dehumanization. Problematizing Islamophobia is not always a clear-cut mechanism – it demands special attention to the power structures that are at play. It is therefore irrelevant if the person that reproduces Islamophobic structures, is himself or herself Muslim or not. As much as racism is not only about intentional racist attitudes, but maintaining, defending, and stabilizing the privileges and power structures of a society structured by a racist epistemically, this also holds true for anti-Muslim racism. Hence, we do not see Islamophobia as the exclusive problem of Muslims, but rather as a problem of the structural and systemic racism that characterizes a whole society. Islamophobia not only directly de-values the lives of otherized people, but questions the humanity of a society that pretends to stand for the equality of all humans.

Combating Islamophobia at European and International Institutions

Combatting Islamophobia at a national level is vital but not enough. The struggle at the European and international level is equally significant. Last year, a number of EU and international institutions published reports and organized events that dealt directly or indirectly with the increasing Islamophobia in Europe and beyond. In this section we would like to draw attention to the findings of these reports and activities.

European Commission (EC)

On May 29, the coordinator on combating anti-Muslim hatred of the European Union organized a virtual roundtable event. The meeting was attended by the representatives of 25 civil society organizations both Brussels-based (e.g., ENAR, Open Society Foundations) and country-based (Spain, Austria, Greece, France, Belgium, Netherlands, Germany, UK, Croatia); and representatives of the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA), the Council of Europe’s European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI), and the OSCE Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR). Jelena Jovanovic, coordinator of the Anti-Racism and Diversity Intergroup (ARDI) in the European Parliament (EP), stressed the importance of finding ways in which the EP and other organizations can work together to combat Islamophobia.

In June, the European Commission released “Countering Illegal Hate Speech Online: 5th Evaluation of the Code of Conduct,” which revealed the diverse grounds for online hate speech. In accordance with the data, 9.4 percent of the hate speech online stemmed from anti-Muslim hatred.

On June 17, the European Commission released the “Anti-Racism Action Plan 2020-2025” that was produced as a result of discussions between the European Commission, the European Parliament, and civil society organizations working against racism. The action plan is seen as an important milestone in the EU’s work against racism and racial discrimination since it recognizes anti-Muslim hatred as a form of racism.

On June 18, the coordinator on combating anti-Muslim hatred chaired a virtual conference on “Fighting Discrimination on Grounds of Religion and Ethnicity: Vulnerabilities of Muslim Communities and the Effects of the Coronavirus Crisis” in cooperation with the Croatian Presidency of the Council of the EU and the European network of Equality Bodies, EQUINET.15

On November 20, the coordinator co-organized and moderated a working group on “Protecting Vulnerable Groups. A Focus on the Dimensions of Education, Youth and Communication in the Fight against Discriminations towards Muslims at the Local Level” as part of the “CommunicAction” General Conference of the European Coalition of Cities Against Racism. The working group featured good practices by a variety of cities in Europe. A key recommendation that emerged from the discussion was the proposal to establish a permanent working group within the network in order to institute a regular exchange of initiatives on fostering inclusion of Muslim communities at the city level.16

European Parliament (EP)

On the European Action Day Against Islamophobia, the EP Intergroup on Anti-Racism and Diversity (ARDI) and the Forum of European Muslim Youth and Student Organisations (FEMYSO) hosted an event. Michael O’Flaherty, the director of the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights, gave a keynote speech. The speakers included Helena Dalli, European commissioner for equality; Evin Incir, MEP and co-president of ARDI; Samira Rafaela, MEP and co-president of ARDI; and Hande Taner the head of campaigns at the FEMYSO.17 In the opening speeches, MEPs shared their concerns over the rise of Islamophobia and hate crimes against Muslim women in Europe. They committed to continue working to tackle this dangerous development. Helena Dalli also introduced the newly released “EU Anti-Racism Action Plan 2020-2025” and explained the EU Commission’s plans for its implementation.

In his op-ed for Euractiv, Magid Magid, former British MEP, argued that Europe has an Islamophobia problem perpetuated by a poorly regulated media and sustained by agenda-driven think tanks. He debated that Muslims have been selectively scapegoated for the ills of society, and relentless suspicion has been unfairly and unjustly cast their way for merely existing.

EU Agency For Fundamental Rights (FRA)

Survey data released by the FRA in June 2020 shows that 22 percent of the general population in the EU would not feel comfortable having a Muslim as a neighbor; 31 percent would not feel comfortable with a member of their family marrying a Muslim; and 21 percent feel that it would be acceptable not to hire a Muslim woman because she wears a headscarf.

On December 19, the FRA took part in a Brussels seminar on a working definition of anti-Muslim hatred/Islamophobia. The meeting was organized by the European Commission coordinator on anti-Muslim hatred. The FRA spoke about the update of its anti-Muslim hatred database. It also covered the agency’s work on hate crime reporting, related technical assistance building on best practices, and consultation with public authorities and civil society organizations.

Court of Justice of the European Union

On December 17, the Court of Justice of the EU ruled that member countries may ban the practice of ritual slaughter in order to promote animal welfare, without infringing the rights of religious groups. In Belgium, the Muslim and Jewish communities which make up approximately 6 percent of the population argue that the decision prohibiting animals from being slaughtered without being shocked and put to sleep restricts their religious freedoms and is disrespectful.

Council of Europe (CE)

In a welcoming development, the European Council created a new position to tackle growing Islamophobia in Europe. On October 7, 2020, the Council of Europe’s Director of Communications Daniel Höltgen was appointed to the new position of “Special Representative on Antisemitic and Anti-Muslim Hatred and Hate Crimes.” In his statement with regards to this appointment, the secretary general of the CE stated,

On Friday it will be one year since the deadly antisemitic attack at a Synagogue in Halle, Germany, on the Jewish holiday of Yom Kippur. In February this year, a far-right extremist killed 10 people, several of them with a Muslim background, in Hanau. These are no longer isolated events. We are witnessing an alarming increase in antisemitic and anti-Muslim attacks in many parts of Europe today, often incited and aggravated by hate speech online.

Like Judaism, Islam is part of today’s Europe. Jews and Muslims should not live in fear of hatred against individuals and their communities. The fight against antisemitic and anti-Muslim hatred and hate crimes is a pan-European task. My Special Representative will work to join forces at the European level and ensure the collective expertise of the Council of Europe is put to full use in our common effort to prevent antisemitic and anti-Muslim acts.22

On the European Action Day Against Islamophobia (September 21, 2020), the Advisory Council on Youth, an initiative launched by the Council of Europe, reiterated the importance of fighting against all forms of racism. The council commemorated and remembered all victims of Islamophobia, including the Srebrenica Genocide, the murder of believers in the Christchurch Mosque attack, and the Hanau attack. The council also recognized the suffering caused by daily physical and verbal Islamophobic harassment, and the continuous institutionalization of Islamophobia through new legislation and policies.23

European Commission Against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI)

The ECRI, the Council of Europe’s independent expert body against racism and intolerance, published its annual report for the year 2019 on February 27, 2020. The Council of Europe Secretary General Marija Pejčinović Burić declared that “Europe is facing a shocking reality: anti-Semitic, anti-Muslim and other racist hate crimes are increasing at an alarming rate, the most recent example being the extremist shooting in Hanau, Germany, in which 9 people were killed and several wounded. Such heinous acts are often precipitated by poisonous words and conspiracy theories spread on social media and the internet.”

On March 17, the ECRI published a report titled “ECRI Report on Germany,” in which it argues that public discourse has become increasingly xenophobic and notes high levels of Islamophobia.

United Nations

The UN did not publish a direct report on Islamophobia in 2020. However, there are important findings about the situation of Muslims in the reports published on the state of human rights around the world in 2020. According to the report published by the UN Human Rights Council in 2020, hate speech towards Muslims is increasing, especially on social media. It is stated in the report that Muslim and Jewish communities in European countries, especially in Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Finland, France, Greece, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and Georgia, are exposed to hate speech more and more every day. The report finds that social media platforms such as Facebook are a key tool for the circulation of “real and constructed hatred towards religious minorities,” especially in India and Myanmar.

The report also highlights the Islamophobic attitudes towards the headscarf, emphasizing that “this situation constitutes discrimination especially in the field of education.” It has been pointed out that prohibiting the wearing of certain types of religious attire in public places, particularly in Western Europe, jeopardizes access to education for women who choose to wear a headscarf/veil because of their religious, cultural, or personal identity or belief. In this context, the UN Human Rights Committee emphasized that such prohibitions could somehow prevent students from continuing their education and create a kind of “intersectional discrimination” against Muslim women who choose to cover their hair or face.

In 2020, the UN Human Rights Council published another report titled “Gender-Based Violence and Discrimination in the Name of Religion or Belief.” The report remarks on important findings on the violence and discrimination experienced by Muslim women. According to the report, women and girls from religious minority communities living in South and Southeast Asia are often at a “special risk of violence,” including violence associated with “forced religious conversion” and “forced marriage.” Along with the violence, it was underlined that the “fight against extremism” measures taken by the governments made minority Muslim women the “target of rape”, “forced sterilization”, and “forced abortion”.

In the report titled “Countering Islamophobia/Anti-Muslim Hatred to Eliminate Discrimination and Intolerance Based on Religion or Belief” published by the UN Human Rights Council at the beginning of 2021, the restrictive aspect of increasing Islamophobia in terms of freedom of religion and belief was emphasized and highlighted.

This report shows that despite their widespread effects, Islamophobia and hatred against Muslims are still not fully understood and discussions on “how to deal with their effects are often full of tensions.” In specific, four policy recommendations come to the fore in the report’s findings regarding increasing global Islamophobia: (i) the need to “unpack the concept of Islamophobia, including the processes of essentialization and racialization that propel this form of bias”; (ii) the need to “document the experiences of affected communities and the human rights impacts”; (iii) the imperative to “affirm the relevant international human rights framework”; and last but not least (iv) the proposal of “recommendations to address and mitigate the impacts of Islamophobia consistent with international law.”

OSCE

In the guide titled “Understanding Anti-Muslim Hate Crimes: Addressing the Security Needs of Muslim Communities,” published in May 2020, the OSCE focused on what can be done about those responsible for addressing hate crimes against Muslims and the security needs of Muslim communities. The guide drew attention to the physical, emotional, and psychological effects of Islamophobia. It was emphasized that Islamophobia can cause Muslim individuals’ a variety of fears the increasing security needs of Muslim communities were highlighted.

It is underlined that increasing Islamophobic attacks may create fear of “attending prayer ceremonies”, “entering mosques”, or “wearing distinctive religious clothing or symbols”. This situation negatively affects the rights of individuals and communities to express their religion or beliefs. It has been emphasized that not being easily identified as a Muslim and not being able to express one's religious identity can lead to exclusion from the public sphere. What is more, such psychological, emotional, and physical effects and fears can cause young children to grow up with a sense of fear and vulnerability.

The report also stated that increasing hostility towards Muslims increases the fears of Muslim communities in the OSCE region. The report points out that the fear of Muslim institutions such as mosques and community centers being targeted by anti-Muslim groups, and the need for security for these institutions are increasing day by day. It has been emphasized that the need to increase security measures will impose a new financial burden on these institutions, and may adversely affect their religious, cultural, and educational activities.

The report, which also includes the findings of the latest research conducted during the year on Islamophobia, revealed the current perception of Muslims in many European countries. For example, in nine of the ten European countries surveyed, it was revealed that “at least 50 percent of the respondents believe that Muslims do not want to integrate” into European society. This view was most prevalent in countries such as Greece (78 percent), Hungary (76 percent), Spain (68 percent), Italy (61 percent), and Germany (61 percent).

In this context, the report calls on the OSCE states to “recognize, record, and report” hate crimes against Muslims. It also draws attention to the threats of hate crimes to the security and social cohesion of individuals, as well as their potential to lead to conflict and violence.

The report ends by listing a series of measures for governments to solve the problem of anti-Muslim hatred. In this context, a series of suggestions were put forward such as “acknowledging the problem”, “risk assessment and prevention of attacks”, “building trust”, “recognizing and recording the problem”, “providing evidence of security needs”, and “supporting research by civil society and academics”.

The Organization of Islamic Cooperation (OIC)

The Organization of Islamic Cooperation published its 13th report on Islamophobia in November 2020.30 In the report, the developments between March 2019 and October 2020 were examined. The report stated that anti-Muslim rhetoric has become the main theme of the campaigns of the far right.

Given incidents such as the burning of mosques, provocative statements on social media, mail threats, burning and disrespecting the Qur’an, physical attacks, verbal abuse, etc., it was emphasized that the United States and Europe continue to be the main hotspots of Islamophobia. In addition, the report also underlined that Islamophobia is increasing in non-Western countries and regions such as Kashmir and Rohingya. For this reason, the report added that “apart from Western countries, countries such as India, Sri Lanka, Myanmar and China should be followed closely in terms of Islamophobia.”

The report emphasized that negative narratives and hate speech on social media, often holding Muslim minorities responsible for spreading COVID-19, increased significantly in some countries. It is even claimed that certain Islamophobic leaders are using COVID-19 as a tool for their anti-Muslim agenda. Since the face veil ban was questioned during the pandemic, when people were obliged to wear masks, the report highlights that there are indications that “some countries may revise their ban policy in the foreseeable future.”

The report also underlines that there were positive developments in 2020 regarding the fight against Islamophobia. In this context, developments such as the initiation of the United Nations Strategy and Plan of Action on Hate Speech, the encouragement of the full implementation of the OHCHR’s UN Resolution 16/18, and the EU’s new initiative of “Combating Racism and Xenophobia” were emphasized.

The Organization of Islamic Cooperation also published the “Islamophobia Monitoring” report in December 2020. The report included important Islamophobic incidents that took place throughout the year. It included many cases from France such as the raid on 76 mosques on charges of discrimination/separatism, the dissolution of the Collective Against Islamophobia in France (CCIF) due to political pressure, the controversial separatism law, and the conviction of far-right activists because of an investigation by Al Jazeera. In addition to these, the attacks on mosques in Germany and the Netherlands and the cancellation of a British journalist’s book contract due to the Islamophobic tweets were included.

Hate crime

As a consequence of the spread of anti-Muslim attitudes, data on hate crime only confirms the rise of anti-Muslim attitudes in many European countries. The overwhelming majority of European states do not record Islamophobic incidents as a separate category of hate crime. In most countries, anti-Muslim hate crime is simply not documented. In the OSCE region, 15 states claim to report anti-Muslim hate crimes, while in 29 states, NGOs also prepare reports.34 Many countries like Albania, Bulgaria, Croatia, Estonia, Hungary, Kosovo, Malta, Russia, and Serbia do not record hate crimes at all. And some countries like Finland, Greece, and Italy do not specify anti-Muslim hate crimes. For the states that document (anti-Muslim) hate crimes, often, the data published by the state and NGOs are far apart.

The recording of anti-Muslim hate crimes by the authorities as a separate category of hate crime is essential to uncovering the real extent of Islamophobia and developing counterstrategies to combat it. At the same time, as the European Union's Fundamental Rights Agency (FRA) has revealed in a report, we have to be aware that it is only a small minority of Muslims (about 12 percent) who have reported cases of discrimination.35 Given the wide discrepancy between the documented numbers of anti-Muslim hate crimes, it is impossible to compare the data. Police authorities in Germany, for instance, have documented 31,472 cases of hate crimes including 901 anti-Muslim hate crimes, while France has only recorded a total of 1,142 hate crimes including 235 anti-Muslim hate crimes. Rather than suggesting that more hate crimes against Muslims occur in Germany than in France, one can suggest questioning how seriously the French authorities document hate crimes in general or how reluctant French Muslims are to report such crimes to the authorities.

Media

The media alongside politics are the most influential spaces where Islamophobia can be either challenged or disseminated and further strengthened. While in some countries, the media challenge power structures to some extent, in most countries, the media are very much connected to power structures and represent different camps along ideological lines or corporation.

As already mentioned above, on the one hand, the media identified the COVID-19 pandemic with Muslims in an unusual way, while on the other, overall, the pandemic led to less reporting on Islam and Muslims. Still, several media outlets reproduced certain images when reporting on racism. Obviously, the tabloid press often plays a problematic role. The German tabloid Bild-Live reported on the racist militant attack in Hanau, speculating that the deeds took place in a “criminal milieu,”36 portraying the shisha bar owner as a criminal who was involved in the shooting for protection money or supremacy. The British Daily Mail covered the Muslim holiday Eid al-Adha with a picture of a site covered in blood. The Irish The Liberal covered Eid al-Adha similarly, saying that “the pitch of Ireland’s largest stadium will soon be saturated in the blood of terrified animals slaughtered with knives and blades,”37 relating it to the “blood of Irish civilians gunned down by British forces during the War for Independence.”38

In Bosnia, the newspaper Danas covered the racist statement of Bosnian Serb leader Milorad Dodik calling for the “sterilization” of territories from immigrants.39 As the author of the Greek report shows, the sports newspaper Sportime even framed a story as “Greece…Europe…Islamization!” In Montenegro, news outlets like http://www.ins4.net and www.borba.me/ spread the idea that Bosnians and Kosovars wanted to create a caliphate, denying the genocide in Srebrenica and asserting that “Bosniaks provoked Srebrenica.” News reporting showing Muslim women as faceless persons, covered, and not participating in society is still often published. The Swiss news outlet Blick covered a youth camp by a Turkish Muslim association as an “Islamist camp,” giving voice to people who call it “a poison for pupils’ integration in Switzerland.”40 The murder of French teacher Samuel Paty gained a lot of attention. Journalists of the Slovenian Nova24 gave space to people like Gregor Preac, a traveler, who argued that 90 percent of Muslims support the beheading of a French teacher and “20,000 Islamic terrorist attacks” happen every year.41 The Romanian newspaper EVZ published a piece with the title “France Puts on the Turban: Macron’s Republic is Undergoing Islamization Rapidly,” thus reaffirming anti-Muslim conspiracy theories.

Online Islamophobia

Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, many of the anti-Muslim incidents reported to monitoring bodies, were online. Since private life shifted largely into the digital realm, the Internet and social media became the primary space for interpersonal relationships. Social media and especially Facebook have become a hotspot for the documentation of anti-Muslim hate crime, as the author of the Danish report Amani Hassani reveals.42

38. Ibid.
The authors of the Hungary report, Nadia Jones-Gailani and Gabi Göbl, reveal that far-right anti-Muslim social movements like the Generation Identity have tried to mobilize especially online.43 The authors of this year’s report have documented several tendencies that could be observed in 2020. Aristotle Kallis has shown in his report on the UK that during the first wave and the lockdown, “all sorts of conspiracy theories originated and gained traction - and predictably anti-Chinese, anti-Muslim, and anti-Semitic content topped the depressing online misinformation charts.”44 Regarding Sweden, Masoud Kamali,45 the author of the country report, argues that fake news and accusations against Muslims and people of color are disseminated – also with the help of robots – by websites that are “in near cooperation with leading figures in the Anti-Muslim and racist party,” the Sweden Democrats (SD). Akvilė Kriščiūnaitė argues in her report on Lithuania that while Islamophobia remains largely unaddressed in general, especially law-enforcement mechanisms do not effectively tackle anti-Muslim hate crime online.

Politics

Islamophobia has become quite mainstream in the political discourse of many European countries. As several studies reveal, especially the racist discourse of the far right, even if in opposition, has an impact on the overall debate about Islam and Muslims,46 and continuously extends the boundaries of reasonable and acceptable speech. Far-right politicians, such as the member of the Swiss SVP Andreas Glarner,47 claim to mobilize against an alleged “preference for Islam.”48 When the far right is in power, Islamophobia becomes legalized. In Staffanstorp and Skurup, two municipalities of Sweden, where the far-right Sweden Democrats are governing, the hijab was banned.49 When a school principal resisted, he received death threats by anti-Muslim and racist groups.50

But it is not only the obvious and blatant Islamophobic speech by far-right politicians like the Austrian FPÖ chairman Norbert Hofer, who said during a party convention “Corona is not dangerous. The Koran is much more dangerous,”\(^51\) that exacerbates the public discourse on Islam and Muslims. It is also the - nominally speaking - mainstream politicians that have fully embraced an anti-Muslim agenda, although in a much more subtle way. Following a police raid on November 9, 2020 that targeted Muslim civil society and not alleged “terrorists,” Chancellor Sebastian Kurz stated, “We have to fight two challengers: First, the corona pandemic and second to fight even stronger against terrorism and radicalization in Austria and Europe.”\(^52\) Similarly, other governing parties that do not belong to the far-right political camp, are supporting an anti-Muslim discourse. An MP from the governing Nea Dimokratia (New Democracy) in Greece spoke about the niqab as “violating women’s rights,”\(^53\) raising the question of regulating it by the state. Following a discussion on migration in Brussels with European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen, Hungary’s prime minister Viktor Orbán stated publicly, “We don’t think a mixture of Muslim and Christian society could be a peaceful one and could provide security and a good life for people.”\(^54\) Finnish Minister of the Interior (Greens) Maria Ohisalo pointed out, “Freedom of speech also comes with responsibility. Speech about immigration turns into hate speech when it is directed at individuals or certain groups in a derogatory way.”\(^55\) This is what we are witnessing on a wide scale by several politicians in power.

Still, it is not a far-right government, but the Emmanuel Macron-led French government that concerned people around the world in 2020. France has become the most worrisome example of state Islamophobia. Following the murder of Samuel Paty, politicians such as Minister of the Interior Gerald Darmanin (who is portrayed next to Emmanuel Macron on this year’s cover of our report) or the mayor of Nice Christian Estrosi publicly called for the circumvention of the rule of law in order to fight what they call “political Islam” and “Islamist separatism.”\(^56\) The French intelligence agencies have claimed to undertake mass surveillance of a large part of the French Muslim population and Amnesty International heavily criticized that these new counter-terrorism measures "violate the principles of non-discrimination, non-refoulement, and the right to freedom of association." As Chafika Attalai and Dahina Moussi have revealed in their report on France, "the state has engaged in a veritable witch hunt and has raided and shut down dozens of Muslim establishments and associations considered a national threat or an ‘enemy of the Republic’. Nevertheless, Damanin also publicly admitted that those raids were only a way to send a message, in other words combating the so-called ‘war on terror’ by terrorizing and stigmatizing a whole group." The proposed bill against separatism announced by Macron made headlines in the news and will be decided upon in 2021. Critics rightfully fear that it will lay the ground for dissolving Islamic organizations without any legal proceeding or due process, forbid non-religious activities for religious organizations and thus de-politicized Muslims in France, implement coercive controls on anti-racist civil society organizations, and expand the hijab bans. This authoritarian move to crack down on Muslims and civil society is equally reflected in the attack by French government officials on anti-racist scholars, who engage in gender and postcolonial studies, and who have become a matter of concern for the ruling French elite.

Following Brexit, the European Parliament currently counts 705 members. While the far-right political group Identity and Democracy (formerly Europe of Nations and Freedom) did not become the fifth-strongest party group in the elections for the European Parliament in 2019, after Brexit, it became the fourth-strongest party, passing the Greens. With 76 seats, Identity and Democracy represents the most successful political group whose members share an anti-Muslim agenda.

Justice System

Institutionalized Islamophobia is the outcome of a hegemonic Islamophobia that is shared across several political camps in power. Legislation and administration reflect the ideologies of elected officials and people in accountable positions. Simultaneously, the independence of the justice system based on the rule of law can still defend basic liberties such as the freedom of religion and belief or the freedom of speech.

58. Chafika Attalai and Dahina Moussi in this report on France.
Far-right political parties try to increase their influence by using the anti-Muslim climate to introduce legislation. While their proposals are often met with opposition if they are not the governing parties, sometimes their claims translate into legislation much later. In December, the far-right Danish People’s Party proposed a bill in parliament to ban the Islamic headscarf in all public institutions, which did not pass. Also, on several occasions, the Dutch PVV leader Geert Wilders suggested banning the headscarf and religious slaughter.

In some political systems like Switzerland with its direct democracy, proposals might even go further, as we have already seen with the ban of the minaret and the mobilization for the face veil ban. National Councilor Jean-Luc Addor of the far-right SVP requested that a law for the “prohibition of headscarves at the counters of the federal administration and companies controlled by the federal government” be drafted.

Other countries have further implemented anti-Muslim legislation. The Belgian Constitutional Court issued a ban of political, philosophical, and faith symbols on the grounds of neutrality, but it was clear from the beginning that this ban would disproportionately impact Muslim women who wear the headscarf.

Diminishing space for Muslims in public life is a central manifestation of Islamophobia and can be found in administrative regulations that are not open per se to democratic deliberation, but rather are under the control of the ruling bureaucracy. In Munich, a female honorary judge was suspended and impeachment proceedings initiated because she had worn a headscarf during oral proceedings.

There are other laws that do not explicitly focus on Islam and Muslims but can potentially affect them as they intersect with how Muslims are positioned. In its report on the expanding so-called war on terror, Amnesty International worded it as such: “The recent wave of counter-terrorism measures also breaches one of the foundational principles of the EU, that of non-discrimination. Often, the measures have proved to be discriminatory on paper and in practice, and have had a disproportionately and profoundly negative impact, particularly on Muslims, foreign nationals or people perceived to be Muslim or foreign.” One striking example is the case of Mohammed Abdulqader, which Aziz Nazmi Şakir documents in his report on Bulgaria. The young man, who won Bulgaria’s youth national championship in wrestling three times, is accused of “terrorist activities abroad” with poor evidence. Similarly, other legislation disproportionately affects Muslims and increases their vulnerability in Europe such as cases where tougher immigration laws are designed that involve the loss of citizenship in cases of dual citizenship.66

At the same time, the fight against Islamophobia continues on a legal basis through the courts. In Austria, one of the most important victories against Islamophobia was the Constitutional Court’s repeal of the ban of the hijab in elementary school in December 2020.67 The Constitutional Court thus red-carded the ban that was implemented by the coalition of the ÖVP and the FPÖ, and which the new coalition of the ÖVP and the Greens wanted to expand to secondary school. The struggle against anti-Muslim discrimination with legal means has to be understood as a way of protecting the constitutions which include legislation on anti-discrimination and freedom of religion or belief.

The Rise of Militant Islamophobia

The role of white supremacist militant groups is becoming more and more a concern in Europe, and we have been dealing with this issue for a few years now.68 In Germany, a right-wing militant killed nine people with an immigrant background, his mother, and himself in Hanau. The perpetrator specifically sought out venues frequented predominantly by people with an immigrant background. The perpetrator was known to the authorities, but police did not act. People with an immigrant background who were well known in the media, as well as many politicians, received threatening letters with the signature “NSU 2.0” – a reference to the National Socialist Underground which had murdered immigrants in Germany in the past.69

As Aristotle Kallis reveals in his report on the UK, Muslim places of worship remained vulnerable not only to performative vandalism, but also to physical attacks. In the UK, most incidents were recorded following the relaxation of the restrictions due to the pandemic.70 An arson attack took place against the mosque on Aylsham

Road in Norwich in July. As a consequence of several physical intimidation tactics of far-right groups, community initiatives were initiated to protect mosques and Islamic centers.

Symbols of violence like the swastika have been documented in various places throughout Europe. In the Swedish municipality of Åstorp, swastikas were drawn along graffiti stating “Bloody Muslims,” not on mosques or Muslim institutions, but on a simple private house resided by Muslim families.

Education

Education can be crucial - be it for reproducing or combatting anti-Muslim racism in a society. As Aziz Nazmi Şakir argues in his report on Bulgaria, “the Bulgarian education system continued to reproduce the image of the historical enemy: Ottomans enslaving Christian Bulgarians and forcibly converting them to Islam.” In the case of Sweden, Masoud Kamali argues that “a governmental inquiry into racism and discrimination from 2006 showed that discrimination against immigrants in general and Muslims in particular is an integrated part of the Swedish school curriculum.” In their report on Poland, Anna Wilczyńska and Karol Wilczyński argue that “fear-mongering, lack of systemic education as well as hateful media campaigns and news are the main reasons why Polish people are prejudiced about Islam.”

The educational performance of Muslims is also suffering because of Islamophobia. Research conducted by the Netherlands Institute for Social Research (SCP) revealed that “Dutch citizens of Moroccan and Turkish origins and Muslims still face fairly much discrimination to the extent of it turning into chronic discrimination, itself leading to the victims retreating from society, losing their faith in institutions or simply giving up when it comes to education or finding a job.”

An additional level of concern is to criminalize Muslim institutions in order to create so-called independent educational institutions. In Sweden, the far-right Sweden Democrats have suggested introducing a bill that outlaws all Muslim schools in Sweden. Although the law did not pass, the ruling parties agreed to forbid the establishment of new religious schools,78 which – according to Masoud Kamali in his report on Sweden – was “a decision that in reality aimed at forbidding Muslim schools in the country.”79

Another highly problematic aspect is Islamophobic knowledge production and its dissemination through channels of power. One example is the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam (Dokumentationsstelle Politischer Islam) by the Austrian government with an annual budget of 500,000 Euros. It is “part of the national strategy of extremism prevention and deradicalization”80 and is supposed to provide the “creation of an overview map of problematic networks and associations in Austria that can be attributed to political Islam (a combat term used by the Austrian government to criminalize Muslim civil society). The aim is to make visible structures, actors, and goals of the representatives of this dangerous ideology. Financial, organizational, and ideological connections (abroad) are also to be investigated and disclosed.”81 One of its directors is a former employee of an institution close to the state that has become infamous for spreading Islamophobia.82 Its director is a Muslim theologian that regularly supported the anti-Muslim policies of the conservative ÖVP and the far-right FPÖ.83 Other members include some of Austria’s most well-known anti-Muslim authors Susanne Schröter,84 Lorenzo Vidino,85 and Heiko Heinisch.86

Step Forward and Policy Recommendations

We can only reiterate the recommendations that we have presented in the last five annual publications of our European Islamophobia Report from 2015 to 2019. As discussed in our introduction to EIR 2019, anti-Muslim militancy has become a major problem that has to be taken seriously by European states.

Security policies especially, including the role of secret services, have to be reassessed. With Austria and France choosing an even more brutal way of surveilling and cracking down on Muslim civil society, anti-Islamophobia scholars, and institutions, these new policies have to be met with decisive opposition. This opposition must be mounted by civil society, non-ideological bureaucrats, and allied nation states that do not share an approach that further pushes the Muslim community to the margin and creates a new ground for replacing a democratic order with an illiberal version of democracy.

79. Masoud Kamali in this report on Sweden.
ISLAMOPHOBIA IN NUMBERS

• “The overwhelming majority of European states do not record Islamophobic incidents as a separate category of hate crime. The recording of anti-Muslim/Islamophobic crimes by the police as a separate category of hate crime is essential to uncover the real extent of this problem and to develop counter-strategies to combat it.

• In the EU, only 12% of Muslims who have been discriminated against report their cases to the authorities. (European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, FRA) The non-exhaustive list that follows hints at the extent of underreporting of anti-Muslim hate crimes in Europe by states and NGOs, which has serious implications regarding the awareness of Muslims and the bureaucracy to tackle these issues.” (EIR 2017)

• The diverging numbers across the countries allude to different degrees of awareness and organization.

BELGIUM

• According to the statistical report published in 2020 by Le Collectif Contre l’Islamophobie en Belgique (CCIB), in the preceding year 90.6% of recorded Islamophobic cases pertaining to individuals were enacted against women, compared to 9.4% against men. This is up from 75% of all victims being female in 2018.

• 26.3% of Islamophobic cases were related to employment.

• 48% of Islamophobic cases were recorded in Brussels, 23% in Wallonia, and 4% in Flanders. (Source: CCIB, Rapport Chiffres 2019)

AUSTRIA

• In 2020, 812 anti-Muslim hate crimes were documented in Austria, which is more than double the number of 2019 with 385 cases. (Source: ZARA)

• Due to COVID-19, the number of online hate crimes increased. A total of 3,215 cases were documented - compared to 1,822 digital hate messages in 2019. Of these cases, 144 had anti-Muslim content. (Source: Anti-Discrimination Styria)

BOSNIA

• A total of 9 incidents were reported. (Source: Commission for Freedom of Religion)
DENMARK

• Muslim women who wear a hijab have to send 60% more job applications than white Danish women. Minority ethnic women have to send 18% more job applications than white Danish women.

UNITED KINGDOM
- In the wake of the first UK lockdown religiously aggravated hate crimes increased by more than a third in comparison to the same period in 2019.
- Half of all religiously aggravated hate crime incidents recorded in 2019 were Islamophobic. (Source: UK Home Office)
- Muslim individuals and households are four times more likely to experience hate crime than those who identify as Christians. (Source: Office of National Statistics)
- More than half of the governing Conservative party’s members think of Islam in negative or very negative terms; nearly half consider it a “threat” to British society. (Source: Hope Not Hate)

IRELAND
- In 2019, Muslims experienced 14% of reported crime cases, 14% of discrimination case, and Muslims were targeted in hate speech on 45 reported occasions. (Source: Irish Network Against Racism)

NETHERLANDS
- According to the second report of the Netherlands Institute for Social Research (Sociaal Cultureel Planbureau, SCP) on discrimination experienced in the Netherlands, people with a migration background (especially Turkish and Moroccan) and Muslims experience relatively high discrimination, stating they feel strongly stigmatized, discriminated and excluded, to the extent of people retreating from society, losing their faith in institutions or simply giving up when it comes to education or finding a job. (Source: Sociaal Cultureel Planbureau)

SPAIN
- There was an overall 6.8% increase in hate crimes: from a total of 1,706 complaints, 66 relate to religion (4.3% less than in 2018) and 515 to racism and xenophobia (20.9% more than in 2018). No segregated statistics for anti-Muslim bias are available. (Source: National Office for Hate Crimes, 2019)
Germany

- In 2020, 901 Islamophobic crimes were registered by the Federal Criminal Police Office throughout Germany.
- In the same year, at least 16 rallies of PEGIDA Förderverein in Dresden, one rally of the Der III. Weg in Haiger, and a rally of Aufbruch Leverkusen in Leverkusen with the slogan that they were against the “Islamization of Germany” took place.
- In 2019, there was a total of 31,472 (13.8% increase) extremist crimes with a political background compared to the previous year (27,656). Of these offenses, 21,290 had a right-wing extremist background. In other words, there was a 9.7% increase compared to the previous year.
- Extremist violent crimes (925) decreased by 13.7% in 2019 compared to the previous year. Among the violent acts, 828 assaults were assigned right-wing extremist ideology.
- 8,585 offenses were ruled to be hate crimes. Of these, 2,032 are anti-Semitic and 950 are Islamophobic crimes.
- In the new thematic field “xenophobic,” which has been in effect since January 1 2019, 3,703 offenses were registered for 2019, of which 506 were violent offenses.
- In the category of crimes against asylum shelters, there was a drop in 2019 (121) compared to the previous year (169).

VIOLENT ACTS AGAINST MUSLIMS IN EUROPE

Violent acts are an outcome of the violent ideology of racist dehumanization. Muslims are increasingly becoming victims solely because of their faith.

BOSNIA
- In Srebrenica, a group of Serb students from elementary school attacked a girl (F.S.) for wearing a hijab.

CROATIA
- Graffiti stating “Ustaše Brda 1950” and “Death to Muslims” appeared on the notch of the railway, in front of the entrance to the tunnel in Dujmovaca, in the town of Split.

CZECH REPUBLIC
- A threatening message was left on the Brno Mosque: “Do not spread Islam in the Czech Republic or we will kill you!”

DENMARK
- Two men followed a Muslim man, questioning him: “Are you Muslim?” and “Why are you here?” The men followed him home, broke into his apartment, and severely beat him. They were charged with racially motivated violence.

ESTONIA
- A masked man dropped pig heads at the door of the Islamic Centre in Tallinn, the Embassy of Turkey, and the Embassy of Azerbaijan.

FINLAND
- A young Muslim was chased and physically attacked by townspeople of Teuva, a city in Western Finland. The victim ended up in hospital because of his wounds. No charges were brought against the perpetrators but the investigating officer has not ruled out a hate crime.
FRANCE
• Two veiled women were stabbed near the Eiffel Tower. The first victim, aged 19, was stabbed three times with a knife. The second, a 40-year-old woman, was injured by six blows, one of which punctured her lung. The attackers called both women “dirty Arabs” and told them, “You are not at home here.” One of them also referred to the veil the victims wore as “that thing you have on your head.”

GERMANY
• A right-wing extremist terrorist shot nine people with an immigrant background, his mother, and himself in Hanau. The perpetrator specifically sought out venues frequented predominantly by people with an immigrant background.

GREECE

IRELAND
• A male Muslim youth (under 18 years old) was attacked by two youths while walking home. He reported that this wasn’t the first time he had been attacked.

ITALY
• On August 28, in the city of Magenta, blogger Francesco Maria Bienati was attacked as a result of his support of a local Muslim association. His injuries required medical treatment.

KOSOVO
• On April 4, 2020, a mosque was burnt in Vërboc, a village about 40 kilometers west of Prishtina, Kosovo’s capital.

MONTENEGRO
• Windows were broken at the local Islamic Community office, and the message “Pljevlja will be Srebrenica” was thrown through a window.
• Three people of Bosniak nationality were attacked and beaten. The attackers used nationalist insults like “It’s time for you to go Turks” and “You are not welcome here.”
NETHERLANDS
• According to Meld Islamofobie’s report, Muslimas with and without facial veils have indicated becoming more often a target of Islamophobia ever since the ban on the facial veil was implemented.

NORTH MACEDONIA
• In the city of Bitola, two newly reconstructed mosques, Haidar Kadi and Ishak Mosques, were covered in graffiti with the message: “Hagia Sofia was and will remain a church.”

RUSSIA
• Attack on Muslim cemeteries in the village of Burayevo (Bashkortostan).

SERBIA
• A man crashed his car into a migrant center in Obrenovac shouting, “I don’t want my girlfriend to be attacked by migrants ... I don’t want a Muslim state ... I don’t want to give Orthodoxy to Muslims and I won’t give it to them, believe me!”

SPAIN
• In Málaga, two Muslim women were threatened and attacked physically with their hijabs being pulled repeatedly in front of their children by unknown women.

SWEDEN
• In Åstorp municipality, “Bloody Muslims” and swastikas were sprayed on a residence where Muslims live.

SWITZERLAND
• A pig carcass was placed anonymously in the mailbox of a Muslim family in Zürich-Schwamendingen.
ISLAMOPHOBIC STATEMENTS BY POLITICIANS

Islamophobic language by high-ranking politicians, mostly from the far right, normalizes a dehumanizing and racist language when it comes to the portrayal of Muslims. This reduces the threshold of what is considered utterable and overall acceptable in public discourse and legitimizes discrimination of Muslims as human beings and as citizens.

ALBANIA

• MP Ralf Gjoni, former member of a left-wing party, during his speech about depopulation of the country stated, “The departure of people will bring as a consequence the fact that in Albania only old people, children of criminals, and hijabi women will remain.”

AUSTRIA

• The president of the Austrian National Council Wolfgang Sobotka (ÖVP) demanded Austria’s Muslims acknowledge the constitution.

BELGIUM

• The right-wing populist party Vlaams Belang posted the following on their Francophone social media: “After Molenbeek-Saint-Jean, here is #Schaerbeek who is putting the question of neutrality into the heart of #communal administration. Carry on like that and ten years from now Brussels will be a Muslim area. Vlaams Belang says loud and clear: NO to #ghettoisation, NO to Islamism and above all NO TO THE #HEADSCARF”

BOSNIA

• Srdjan Mazalic a member of the parliament of the Bosnian Serb entity, Republika Srpska, shared a tweet stating, “Albanians should be accepted as equal human beings,” even though according to his calculations of autosomal DNA, there is a “genetic distance to different ethnic groups.”
BULGARIA

• Krystian Szkwarek, a representative of the group of European Conservatives and Reformists for Bulgaria (Europe’s leading conservative movement), stated, “This is the first known caricature of Muhammad from Cluny Abbey dating back to 1142 [a drawing of the 12th-century abbot Peter the Venerable showing the Prophet as a monstrous siren]. ‘Charlie Hebdo’ is not the pioneer in our reasonable mockeries of the Arab cutthroat, who slept with underage girls, and of the disgusting religion he created.”

• Angel Dzhambazki, a member of the European Parliament and vice-chairman of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organisation, stated, “Hundreds, perhaps thousands of ISIS militants entered Europe during the greatest immigration pressure. Today, they live here and are waiting for the moment when your extreme Marxism and liberal Bolshevism will lead to the collapse of the European nation-states and they will see in this collapse a chance to establish their so-called caliphate…”

CROATIA

• The city councilor from the city of Split, Martin Pauk, created an event on his social media profile titled “Throwing Cracklings and Bacon on the State Border.” In it, he pointed out that by doing so he will protect Croatia from migrants.

CZECH REPUBLIC

• Minister of Education Jean-Michel Blanquer stated, “Mothers should not be allowed to wear a headscarf during school trips.”

DENMARK

• Regarding the Muslim dowry, Foreign and Integration Minister Mattias Tesfaye stated, “This kind of bazaar trade between clans must be stopped, it should not exist in 2020.”

ESTONIA

• Jaak Madison, a member of the European Parliament and the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia, in response to the attacks in France stated, “We have repeatedly seen in Europe in recent years how even these so-called peaceful Muslims are silent when their comrades-in-arms detonate bombs, attack the Christmas markets with lorries or cut off heads with machetes. Islam is not suitable for Europe.” He added that “decades of politics of tolerance and equality do not work and will not work.”
FRANCE

- President Emmanuel Macron stated, “The problem is Islamist separatism. It is a conscious, theorized, politico-religious project, which takes the form of repeated deviations from the values of the Republic, which often results in the constitution of a counter-society and whose manifestations are the dropping out of school of children, the development of sport communities supporting cultural practices, which are the pretext for teaching principles that do not conform to the laws of the Republic. It is indoctrination and through it, the negation of our principles, equality between women and men, human dignity. The problem is this ideology, which asserts that its own laws are superior to those of the Republic.”

GERMANY

- Alternative for Germany (Alternative für Deutschland, AfD) spokesman and parliamentary group leader of the AfD in the Thuringian state parliament Björn Höcke tweeted, “Trafficking-icon Carola Rackete: I imported torture, sexual violence, human trafficking and murder.”

GREECE

- Konstantinos Bogdanos, MP of the ruling party Nea Dimokratia (New Democracy), stated, “It is of high concern and more common in Greece - especially in the Athens center - the image of women who follow the Muslim dressing, burqa and niqab, which cover their whole bodies, the head and the face, leaving only the eyes free in some cases. Although burqa and niqab are being worn by an Islamic order, the state is not interested in that from a religious point of view. However, burqa and niqab consist at the same time a security problem, since they can make anyone invisible to the other citizens and the authorities, while at the same time they violate women’s rights, when they are obliged to wear them, via intimidation and repression, something completely unacceptable for the country’s dominant culture and its legal culture.”
[...] Since Greece is and owes to continue to be a safe country, where women are absolutely equal and free citizens, I ask you Mr. Minister [of Justice]: the female Muslim dressing of burqa and niqab, which hide from public view all human characteristics, are they an issue of public and parliamentary deliberation, towards a legal resolution of the problems they create?”

HUNGARY

• “In Hungary, we are very strict that we would not like to have a parallel society, or open society or a mixed-up culture. We don’t think a mixture of Muslim and Christian society could be a peaceful one and could provide security and a good life for the people.” PM Orbán

IRELAND

• Gemma O’Doherty, a candidate in the general election of 2020, said, “For more Female Genital Mutilation (5k+ cases here so far), ISIS training camps in our mountains, Imams promoting child marriage, jihadi factories, subjugation of women and barbaric halal, vote Sinn Fein, #FFFG and Marxist Left today #GE2020. To end it, #VoteGemma2020”.
• Justin Barrett, the leader of the National Party since stated, “Ireland will be nationalist and free, or, under Shariah law”

ITALY

• The leader of Lega Nord party, Matteo Salvini, stated, “In my opinion, it [spread of antisemitism in Europe] is also due to the increasing of Islamic extremism and fanatics (…) the great presence of immigrants coming from Muslim countries contributes to the spread of antisemitism in Italy too.”

LITHUANIA

• Egidijus Vareikis, a Christian Union candidate who was not elected to parliament, stated, “In the eyes of Islamic practitioners (perhaps not all, but at least some), liberal public administration sows clutter, reduces discipline and responsibility, and weakens faith and loyalty to one’s tribe and state.”

NETHERLANDS

• In reaction to a Flemish news article about a young man of non-Dutch descent who was “only” sentenced to community service, Burger Partij Amersfoort (BPA) party foreman Hans van Wegen wrote on Twitter, “His name is Youssef and not Henk, so he gets away with it.”
NORTH MACEDONIA

- During election camping, the president of political party Levica stated, “So what is the problem with us? See the whole country Islamized, the Imams sing like in an Islamic republic. Do you not see the Islamization that is happening from Bit Market (Old Town) onwards, do you not see radical Islam entering here, Wahhabism?”

POLAND

- Zbigniew Ziobro, minister of justice, prosecutor general, and a leader of the party Solidarna Polska, tweeted and said during television interview that Islam is alien to Polish culture and suggested that Poland should defend itself against it.

ROMANIA

- In July 2020, two parliamentarians from the Social Democratic Party (PSD) got into an argument with the Turkish cashier of a fast-food restaurant in Bucharest after the latter asked them to wear face masks while in the restaurant. In reply, one of the parliamentarians started insulting the cashier and asked to see his work permit. According to the video camera recording, the PSD MP Adrian Solomon told the cashier, “Yo, Mustafa, you are in Romania here. Hello, Mustafa! Show me you have a working permit here! Yo, tramp!”

SLOVENIA

- Branko Grims, Slovenian Democratic Party member and member of parliament stated, “The simultaneous invasion of Islamists (who are still misleadingly called ‘refugees’ by many) and the SARS-CoV-2 pandemic pose the Slovenian police with the impossible task of managing all these security tasks at the same time. There are too few of them and they are overwhelmed.”

SPAIN

- Santiago Abascal, president of Vox and congressman during a non-related plenary session, stated, “Macron is expelling more than 200 suspects of jihadism [...] he has realized that Islam becomes a danger to the civilization that hosts it. Jihadism must be ended, because it continues to behead people shouting ‘Allah is great.’ Not only do they act with knives, they also do it through education, despising women [...] If the renegades managed to break Spain, they would only be able to form the Catalan Islamic Republic.”
SWEDEN
• The leader of the Liberal Party, Nyamko Sabuni, stated that “the vision of a multicultural society must be buried” and “religious schools must be forbidden.”

SWITZERLAND
• National councilor Andreas Glarner announced in his party speech that he will address “fie” topics - Islam and Muslims. He confessed Islam as one of his core issues and announced “the preference for Islam” as a problem, to be defended against.

LEGALIZING ISLAMOPHOBIA

Governments and political parties implement or demand legislation that directly targets Muslims as religious subjects, treating them differently than members of other religious communities.

AUSTRIA

- The Documentation Center Political Islam was established.
- Raids took place against alleged members of the Muslim Brotherhood and Hamas, which targeted scholars and aid organizations.
- Constitutional Court repealed the hijab ban in elementary school.

BELGIUM

- The Belgian Constitutional Court issued a ban of political, philosophical, and faith symbols on the grounds of neutrality. The ban would disproportionately impact Muslim women who wear the headscarf.

BULGARIA

- The Specialized Prosecutor’s Office accused Mohammed Abdulqader, a Bulgarian youth champion in wrestling born to a Bulgarian mother and Syrian father, of participating in “terrorist activities abroad.” The only evidence was a few photos he posted on social media that were taken in 2015-2016 in Syria, in which the then 16-year-old teenager was wearing military uniform and holding various weapons.

DENMARK

- The Danish People’s Party proposed a bill in parliament to ban the Islamic headscarf in all public institutions. The bill did not pass.

FINLAND

- Former minister of the interior, Kai Mykkänen, asked Minister of the Interior Maria Ohisalo if the government plans to move ahead with the passing of tougher immigration laws proposed by the previous government (2015-2019). Some of the changes would involve the loss of Finnish citizenship if a person is convicted of a serious crime. Loss of citizenship can only take place if the person convicted has dual citizenship.
FRANCE
- A bill was proposed against so-called separatism including an amendment to prohibit the wearing of the veil for women under the age of 18 in public spaces, an amendment prohibiting the burkini in public swimming pools, and an amendment prohibiting veiled mothers from accompanying their children on school trips.

GERMANY
- An honorary judge in Munich was suspended and impeachment proceedings were initiated against her for wearing a headscarf at an oral proceeding.

ITALY
- With sentence N. 4330 released on October 28, the Court of Appeal of Milan authorized health facilities to use signs with graphic representations to prohibit access to women wearing a burqa.

NETHERLANDS
- On several occasions, PVV leader Geert Wilders suggested banning the headscarf and religious slaughter.

SWEDEN
- The minister of education, Anna Ekström, told the daily journal Dagens Nyheter that “the government has decided to stop the establishment of new religious schools.” This is a result of a debate on the establishment of Muslim schools in Sweden.

SWITZERLAND
- According to Jean-Luc Addor, SVP national councilor, headscarves and other Islamic symbols should not be tolerated in public companies, as they contradict local traditions and the constitutional principle of equality between men and women. He requested that a law be drafted entitled “Prohibition of Headscarves at the Counters of the Federal Administration and Companies Controlled by the Federal Government.”

UNITED KINGDOM
- On Twitter, high-profile Conservative party activist Theodora Dickinson asked Labour party MP Naz Shah, who was born in Bradford, the following: “If racist Naz Shah hates this country so much why doesn’t she go back to Pakistan?!”
ISLAMOPHOBIA IN THE MEDIA

The media play a crucial role in the reproduction and normalization of anti-Muslim racism.

ALBANIA

Journalist Arbana Xharra stated, "The hijab is a misogynistic and sexist act. The primitiveness of some who want to sell the handcuffing of a woman as freedom of expression!"
AUSTRIA

Die Presse journalist Gudula Walterskirchen supported a hijab ban.

The daily Kleine Zeitung covered an article published by the ÖVP-owned Oberösterreichisches Volksblatt with Seyran Ates. Ates argued, “How can we, as an open civil society, accept that a religious community says that as soon as our female members reach sexual maturity, they must cover themselves? That turns the girls into sexual objects.”
BOSNIA

Danas published a statement by Bosnian Serb leader Milorad Dodik calling for the “sterilization” of territories from migrants.

CROATIA

Columnist Ivica Sola wrote an article titled “This Is a War against Europe and the Rest of the Christian Remnants.”

ESTONIA

In an article, Minister of the Interior Mart Helme stated that there is a strong pressure to build mosques in Estonia, which would “become centers for radical Islam, where measures are planned that endanger members of society.”
FINLAND

A story by Finland’s biggest daily, Helsingin Sanomat, suggested that violent crimes in Helsinki are on the rise and committed by so-called youths of migrant backgrounds. The newspaper retracted its earlier claims after the police, Minister of the Interior Maria Ohisalo, and experts challenged the paper’s sensationalist claims that labelled, among other matters, brown Finns as violent criminals.

The popular new site Origo published the headline: “We don’t believe in the virus, we believe in Allah – praying crowds may spread the infection.”

IRELAND

Headline: “The Alliance of Former Muslims Ireland has hit out at the GAA [Gaelic Athletic Association] allowing Croke Park to be used for Eid al-Adha festivities.” The main text includes, “While the pitch of Ireland’s largest stadium will soon be saturated in the blood of terrified animals slaughtered with knives and blades without any form of sedation, just a century ago the field of Croke Park was reddened by the blood of Irish civilians gunned down by British forces during the War for Independence.”
ITALY

The Farefuturo Foundation (Fondazione Farefuturo) published the “First Annual Report on Europe’s Islamization.” It was co-published with the Fratelli d’Italia party (2020).

KOSOVO

The Washington Times published an article about Kosovo built around the “Great Replacement” theory according to which Orthodox Christian Serbs, as “real” Europeans, lost Kosovo to “Oriental” Muslim Albanians after the war ended in 1999. The article included the following sentence: “Kosovo’s most famous exports are jihadists.”

LITHUANIA

A post accompanying an article about the murder of Samuel Paty on the official Facebook page of the news portal Alfa.lt included the following, “It’s already nothing strange to laugh at the French, Germans or Swedes for opening the borders and accepting refugees, they fooled themselves and refused to see the reality. But it seems that the patience of the French has run out.”
MONTENEGRO

Headline: “Alija Izetbegovic Is a Criminal Who Wanted to Create an Islamic State on the Serbian Land.”

Headline: “Caliphate Is Born in Kosovo (Jihad Started in Serbia and It Is Not Started by ‘Evil’ Arabs from Far East But by Our Recent Neighbors - Albanians.”

NETHERLANDS

A new report released by S.P.E.A.K. on the representation of Muslims in the photo database of the Algemeen Nederlands Persbureau BV (ANP), the largest news agency in the Netherlands, concluded that the pictures of the press agency’s database give a monotone impression of Muslimas. Most of them are images of covered women, not visible as active citizens participating in society nor as individuals in their own social environment.

POLAND

Polish national television published a short feature on the “Brutal Islamization of Western Europe.”

Ludzie we Francji wychodzą na ulice, aby oddać cześć zamordowanemu brutalnie nauczyelowi. Po ataku terrorystycznym - w którym osiemnastoletni zamachowiec obciął nauczyelowi głowę - służby aresztowały piętnaście osób. Islamizacja we Francji i innych krajach zachodniej Europy przybiera na sile.

Reporting on a study concerning the relationship between Muslims and non-Muslims in France, the daily EVZ used the following misleading title for its article: ‘France Puts on the Turban: Macron’s Republic Is Undergoing Islamization Rapidly.”

SERBIA

Headline: “Albanians Are Preparing Riots for Christmas. Islamist Groups from Kosovo and Metohija Are Involved.”

SLOVENIA

Gregor Preac, a journalist, publicist, and traveler, stated the following: “Ninety percent of Muslims support the beheading of a French teacher, they have verbally desecrated the beheaded teacher, and protests against France are raging around the world. With 20,000 Islamic terrorist attacks a year, this is further clear evidence that Islam is the birthplace of violence, psychopathy and sociopathy.”

“Many theorists of religious and ideological books compare the Qur’an to Mein Kampf in terms of violence. Islam also kills those who renounce Islam, those who insult their families, and those who insult Muhammad, Allah, the Qur’an, in short, it kills all the time.”

“I have been traveling, living, working around the world and Islam for 33 years, speaking their languages, delving into literature, the lives of Islamic people, writing articles, books - why is there so much poverty, illiteracy, gender inequality, religion, so much violence in Islam?”

SWEDEN

Swedish television covered and distributed the anti-Muslim propaganda by the racist party Sweden Democrats and their suggestions regarding the prohibition of Muslim women’s headscarf.

Blick published an article on a children’s winter camp described as an “Islamist camp” in which it was claimed that “Turkey indoctrinates Swiss children.”

Executive Summary

This report records and analyzes Islamophobic incidents that occurred in Albania in 2020. Different international political and social events, the two crucial ones being the murder of the teacher Samuel Party in Paris and the terror attack in Vienna, and national and local occurrences influenced the course of the anti-Muslim rhetoric. This rhetoric is characterized by Islamophobic hate speech and anti-Turkish narrative as well. During 2020, Islamophobia was mostly directed against local Muslims who have a voice and an impact in society by putting them under pressure and forcing them to condemn the “terrorist attacks” in the world. Islamophobia was also directed against imams who were mocked publicly by well-known journalists and analysts. The online domain, including news portals and social media, remains the main hub for promoting anti-Muslim hate speech. The online platforms are used by journalists, public figures, and citizens to spread anti-Muslim sentiments.

Introduction

In recent years, Muslims in Albania have experienced an intensification of Islamophobia in various spheres of life, especially in politics, media representation, and the justice system, with negative opinions and stereotyping, as well as hate speech on mainstream media, social media, and other online platforms. This discrimination against Albanian Muslims has been fueled by numerous media pundits, journalists, and politicians in Albania as this report will show. The overall impression propagated by the Albanian online media is that of a growing Islamic extremism and radicalism, with the Albanians allegedly playing a part in this. For instance, in the aftermath of the Vienna terrorist attack where one of the attackers was of Albanian origin from North Macedonia, the mainstream media in Albania were eager to discuss the topic and try to analyze the reasons behind the radicalization of the young attacker, focusing mainly on its religious and ethnic origin. Nevertheless, many reports and seminars organized on the topic of discrimination and hate speech in Albania failed to recognize and address Islamophobia as a crucial part of the hate speech discourse, focusing mainly on discrimination against groups like the LGBT community and the Roma.

The Covid-19 pandemic has had an effect on hate speech and Islamophobia worldwide and has increased the tendency to promote Islamophobia, even in Albania, by presenting Muslims as responsible for the spreading of the virus especially during the Ramadan and Eid celebrations. With the arrival of Ramadan, there was an attempt by the main Albanian-speaking portals in Albania, Kosovo, and North Macedonia to import this narrative of fear and panic into the Albanian reality as well.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

The Tabak Mosque is in danger of disappearing from the collective memory in the city of Vlora, due to the placement of a statue in honor of Osman Haxhi, a local patriot. On August 27, 2020, on the official website of the municipality of Vlora, the mayor announced the inauguration of the statue in a place where the Tabak Mosque used to exist. The mosque is thought to have been built after the twentieth century, in front of today’s municipality and was demolished and replaced by another building in 1962 by the regime of the time. More than a year ago, during the works for the rehabilitation of the historic center of Vlora, the walls of this old mosque were discovered. This was an important discovery not only for the Regional Directorate of National Culture of Vlora but also for the Muslim community. However, following the discovery, everything remained in the framework of papers and promises which guaranteed that at least one part of the walls would be left as a symbol of the existence of the mosque and of the city’s Islamic heritage. Soon thereafter, the walls were covered with cement. Today, the memory of the once magnificent mosque is being obscured by the construction of a statue.3

Employment

According to the report by the Commissioner for Protection from Discrimination, published in 2020,4 the total number of complaints in the field of employment, which were dealt with during the first half of the year, was 23. Among the various reasons for discrimination in employment there were no reports related to religion. The Muslim Forum of Albania, an organization dealing among other things with monitoring Islamophobic and racist incidents in different fields, didn’t receive any complaints either.5

However, as in the past, women with hijabs complain about being discriminated due to their religious identity.6 A Muslim journalist indicated that several times she was not hired because of her headscarf. She claimed that after being called for a job interview, she was told that the institution can’t hire her.

In addition, there are many cases of men and women who have faced various forms of discrimination, especially in the case of a visible religious identity, during their job interviews; however, they refused to make their stories public due to fear of repercussions.7

According to the Albanian constitution, schools are secular. This means that the curricula approved by the Ministry of Education must not have a religious content.8

Related to a sexual abuse story, after the statement that one of the perpetrators had been a “teacher of the Islamic religion,” the imam Ahmed Kalaja was invited to the TV program “Ftesë në 5,” where he suggested that in the education system and school curricula, besides the subject of sexual education, religion education should be included as a non-compulsory subject, as is the case in other developed countries. He stated that the subject’s aim must be to introduce pupils to some basic knowledge of Islam and to focus on ethics such as love and respect for people, for our parents, etc.

Politics

On July 15, the National Center for Books and Reading, founded by the Ministry of Culture, organized a competition for choosing Albanian books to be translated into foreign languages. Among the twelve authors, only six were selected and among those six there was a book by Ben Blushi, a politician and writer known for his Islamophobic stances. Blushi’s novel Othello, The Arab of Vlora, which contains racist and Islamophobic content, was chosen to be translated into Greek. This means that the ministry’s funds will be spent on the promotion of hatred, as this book is offensive towards the majority of the Albanian population, namely Muslims.

A debate on religious grounds was included in the proceedings of the plenary session of the Assembly on October 7, 2020. The debate was initiated by Ralf Gjoni, an Albanian MP and former member of the LSI, a left-wing party, who while talking about depopulation said that the departure of people will result in an Albania where only old people like Spartak Braho, children of criminals, and hijabi women will remain. After Gjoni’s speech, the chairwoman of the plenary session, Vasilika Hysi, intervened and warned him about the insulting language. MP Halit Valteri said that Gjoni should wash his mouth when talking about women with headscarves, as “they are hundred times more honored than him.” Valteri then asked the chairwoman to expel “people with strong Islamophile attitudes” from the parliament.

In the aftermath of the Vienna attack, Spartak Ngjela, who was an MP between 2001 and 2009, claimed on a television program that “our medieval history was characterized by Islamic terrorism, that’s the only thing they (Muslims) know to do well: killing, massacres etc.….” The journalist Fitim Zekthi immediately answered saying Ngjela was nothing more than an ignorant Islamophobe who has read only two books and is a failed politician.15

Media

As in past years, the anti-Turkish propaganda continues to be spread by sharing content that is not relevant to the Albanian social and political context. Turkophobia was also promoted by the fake news published by the newspaper Gazeta Express “Marry Your Rapist,” where it was claimed that a new scandalous draft law in Turkey legitimizes rape, child marriage, and sexual abuse.16

The well-known Islamophobe Kastriot Myftaraj has compared Turkey’s support for the process of the rehabilitation after the devastating earthquake of November 26, 2019, to “Turkish charity with 500 apartments, or neo-Ottoman investment: Turkey donated us 500 ‘crumbs’ from the ‘baklava’ of its profits in Albania.”17 According to Myftaraj, the Turkish government can afford to play the role of being charitable in Albania by building a neighborhood of 500 apartments. He claims that by doing so, they will, of course, build a mosque and a Turkish school in the middle of the neighborhood. “Given the official neo-Ottoman policy of Islamization pursued by the Turkish government, it is not known whether this Turkish neighborhood should be called Turkish charity or Turkish investment. It is no coincidence that the city of Lac, with a majority Catholic population, was chosen to strengthen the Muslim presence there. Every 1 million dollars of Arab and Turkish aid in Albania is provided on the condition that a minaret must be built too, which requires at least one mosque,” he added on his post on Facebook.18

The Albanian writer Silvana Berki, a resident of Finland, published the article “STOP - These Turkish Movies, Which Are Infecting Albanian Screens.”19 This claim is despite the fact that there are not only Turkish soap operas on Albanian media, but also Indian, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, and English movies and series.

18. Ibid.
Another public figure in the Islamophobia network, Fahri Xharra, also contributed to the anti-Turkish rhetoric with a call to all Albanians against Turkey. According to Xharra, the Ottoman regime disconnected Albanians from their roots and heritage, and if we rely on Turkey, we will again be denied our identity as Albanians. Xharra added that it is because of the Ottomans that Albanians converted from Catholicism and Orthodoxy to Islam.

Albanian political actors not infrequently choose to address and give messages to citizens with citations from the Bible or the Qur'an. Mustafa Nano, a journalist who is well-known for his Islamophobia, stated that such messages are public shows. According to Nano, their use is inappropriate “because politics is something different and religious belief is something else”, meaning that politics and religion should not be mixed. In his monologue during his TV program “Provokacija” titled “If there was a God, the first in hell would be Trump, Erdogan, Netanyahu, and their people in Albania” he claimed, “Trump, Erdogan, and Netanyahu can be believers. Still, they do not hold the Bible, the Qur’an, or the Tanakh in their hands as believers. They hold them in their hands as politicians. Whoever does the show with faith, does not do so in the name of faith. He does so in the name of politics. Secularism is a value and shows like those of Trump, Erdogan, and Netanyahu compromise this value. Here in Tirana, the day has not yet come for a politician to take to the streets and squares with a Bible or the Qur’an in his hand, but that day will also come. They are just warming up.”

In the same program, Nano also mocked the imam and mufti of Shkodra, by saying, “We do not deny that Muhamet Sytari believes in God. We do not deny that he is also Albanian. By the way, Muhamet Sytari paid homage these days to Mehmet II, the sultan who conquered Constantinople, the sultan who conquered all the areas where Albanians live today. This is not normal. With this he did not do a religious thing. He did a political thing. In this case he is not a Muslim. He is Turkish. He eats the bread of the Albanians and makes dua (prays) for the Turks.”

On another occasion, during a debate about the Prophet Muhammad cartoons and the murder of Samuel Paty in France, Nano claimed that he feels offended by...

23. Ibid.
the Muslim women with hijabs,\textsuperscript{25} that hundreds of Muslims believe that women are below men,\textsuperscript{26} and that some people may be offended by the \textit{adhan}, so let them be (is their right to feel so).\textsuperscript{27}

The Albanian journalist from Kosovo Arbana Xharra continues her anti-Muslim propaganda, this time by “warning” that “Albanians are carrying out extremist activities in Switzerland.” She claimed that the Albanian people are playing a terribly prominent role in extremist activities in Switzerland\textsuperscript{28} and in the suburbs of large cities like Zurich, St. Petersburg, Gallen, Bern, and Basel, where imams “roam” against the West. “A few days ago, a Kosovar imam was deported from Switzerland, who was accused of beating his wife and his religious sermons were contrary to Swiss law, or another whose sermons were approaching anti-Semitism,” she added. The imam in question has denied all accusations.\textsuperscript{29}

Following the Vienna terror attack, Xharra posted the article “I Was Right” -- a reference to the fact that the terrorist was of Albanian heritage. According to her almost-prediction, “I was declared Islamophobic and still carry this epithet. For years, as I struggled to raise awareness of the great danger of this cancer, propaganda was made against me with slander, to lose my credibility when I talk about Islamist extremists. During these eight years, I have seen that Albanians are fulfilling the agenda of Serbia, what for 100 years this regime tried to portray to the world, ‘Islamist terrorist Albanians - Middle East and the Balkans.’ They are filling the mosques of Europe with Albanians calling for jihad, they took part in terrorist attacks like the last one in Vienna, days ago they demanded the departure of Kosovo’s ambassador to France because he criticized an Islamist terrorist who beheaded a teacher . . . ” \textsuperscript{30} Xharra also claims that at the University of Pristina, public and private institutions, and influential people are campaigning in favor of Erdogan and against voices that criticize “Islamist agendas.” “Albanians like the one that filled the front pages of the media today (the Vienna attacker) have been recruited by the imams of Kosovo, Macedonia, and Albania. In the name of the ‘religion of peace,’ today more than ever Albanians are on the black list of Islamist extremists in the world. This is just the beginning, we will see what will happen in a few years!” she added on her post.

The TV program on RTV Ora, PolitikOn of November 5 was entitled “Albanian Jihad.” Starting from the very title and later the opening monologue, the video insert, etc., the program was built on an Islamophobic narrative, by emphasizing expressions such as “Islamists”, “radical Muslim”, “Islamic terrorist”, “jihadist”, “Islamic propaganda”, etc. The debate moderator, a journalist known for other Islamophobic incidents as well, Alfred Lela, started his monologue by saying that the mosques have reverted people to religion but not people to God. According to him “tele-imams” or electoral imams are installing a political Islam that suggests choosing between Erdogan and Gülen, and what is left can be given to the next Eastern Cezar. “The cult objects are not building for the believers but for the followers, and all this seems like Muslim-related troubles but in fact is related to all Albanians,” Lela added in his monologue. It should be mentioned that the two most prominent figures of Islamophobia in Albania were invited to the debate: the journalists Arbana Xharra and Mustafa Nano.

Related to the issue of the “freedom of expression” discourse, according to the political scientist Ermal Hasimja, “It is better to suffer from the consequences of freedom of expression than from its absence as a restriction.” Hasimja said that what has further increased the tensions in France is related to the strengthening of some factions, which do not allow Muslims’ integration into society and lead to such acts.

In October 2020, Qendrim Gashi, Ambassador of Kosovo in France, shared a post on his Twitter account from Le Figaro with a report of the chronological events dealing with the reactions in the aftermath of the publications featuring Charlie

Hebdo cartoons representing the Prophet Muhammed and the murder of Party. The post was later deleted by the Ambassador, followed by a statement where he explained his stance on the issue. The Islamic Community of Kosovo (BIK) condemned the Ambassador’s post on Twitter and even required his resignation. Following BIK’s reaction, the journalist Mero Baze, owner of the newspaper Gazeta Tema, published an article titled “Talibanism Requires a Governmental Reaction.” Baze said that the Islamic Community of Kosovo should have first condemned the “act of execution” of the French teacher; if they didn’t do so, it means that they agree with this kind of execution. Later, he mocked the Muslim intellectual Kim Mehmeti, who called the ambassador in question a “monster, who is better locked in a cage in the zoo so even if he barks, at least he can’t bite anyone.”

The national television channel Top Channel, this year, as in the past, has fostered Islamophobia with different media contents, but especially with the television programs that have been analyzed in this report. One of the most controversial such occasions was the TV show “Dua te te bëj te lumtur” (I want to make you happy) which was broadcast on June 6. On the show, stories of sexual abuse were disclosed and specifically the story of an orphan who claimed to have been regularly abused during her stay at the orphanage in the city of Shkodra. The 27-year-old Adriana made the shocking confession that the abuser was a teacher of Islamic religion. The first shadow of doubt regarding the accusation was that at the orphanage in Shkodra - or at any other orphanage in the whole country – there is no teacher of religion, be it Islam or Christianity. Antonjeta Pero, the social worker who worked at the orphanage, confirmed this and stated, “The orphanage has never had Islamic or Christian teachers in its staff.” There were other reactions as well who defined the case as slander: Justinian Topulli from the Muslim community; Agron Hoxha, a member of the Muslim Community of Albania (KMSH); and the human rights lawyer Gentian Sejrani.

It comes as no surprise that Top Channel, whose general manager is Ben Blushi, a well-known Islamophobe,\textsuperscript{45} would choose to highlight an aspect of the story where the villain does not have a name, a face, or a concrete address, but is a random character with an “Islamic religious denominator.” This certainly serves the scandal and provokes extraordinary reactions and great indignation in the audience, regardless of the consequences. The statement that one of the perpetrators had been a “teacher of the Islamic religion” unbalances the narrative and provides information which rather than giving details about the perpetrator or his identity, stigmatizes and creates distrust of a certain category of people (Muslim) that identify with this common denominator (“Islamic”).

The reaction of the media, portals in particular, was even more problematic.\textsuperscript{46} In the domain of Albanian portals, which operate more in the format of tabloids, the truth and the avoidance of general harm have never been part of their work ethic.

Instead, the “teacher of the Islamic religion” as the rapist was the headline,\textsuperscript{47} this unknown perpetrator became the biggest concern\textsuperscript{48} of any portal and the main culprit in the media dock.\textsuperscript{49}

The way Adriana’s story was reflected in the media, but also many other cases, shows that we are dealing with a trend in the Albanian media and a serious problem with the way such incidents are reported, especially when the event is closely related to Islam and Muslims. This is a problem that this report on Islamophobia in Albania has pointed out, emphasizing that certain media has the tendency to report or write systematically about Islam and Muslims focusing only on negative aspects and events filled with stereotypes and prejudices.

\textbf{Justice System}

On September 12, 2020, an “online petition” on the Change.com platform,\textsuperscript{50} was initiated by a group of Albanian citizens in defense of imam Genc Balla, who is under the “41 Bis” system - a way of punishment implemented in Albania since August

1, 2020. The “41 Bis” system is dedicated to prisoners with high risk and potential threat (drug trafficking, homicide, aggravated robbery and extortion, kidnapping, terrorism, and attempting to subvert the constitutional system). However, Balla was detained in 2014 under the accusation of terrorism. According to the petition, Balla has not engaged in any terrorist act.51

His family members claim that he is denied any contact with his family and that he cannot receive books or food. It has been reported that he was under treatment due to health problems as he was denied halal food. For a period of time, he was given intravenous feeding because he refused to eat non-halal food.52

On October 2, 2020, the individuals behind the petition applied for permission to conduct a democratic protest in front of the Ministry of Justice in Tirana against this torture, which was rejected by the police. Among the activists was also the historian and journalist Olsi Jazexhi who declared that he has received phone calls from police officers warning him not to attempt to approach the institutions53. Mr Jazexhi was detained during the time when the protest was supposed to be held, and then was released later that day.54

The journalist Arbana Xharra wrote a post about the hijab on her social media account,55 after a long debate56 related to the beginning of the new academic year in Kosovo. (Fig. 1) The focus of the debate, which involved very important political actors and policy-makers, was the decision of whether to allow hijabs in the public schools of Kosovo. In her post, Xharra stated that in the Qur’an the fact that a Muslim woman should be covered is not mentioned, but that this is the legacy of Ottoman Sultan Abdulhamid. She called the hijab a “misogynistic and sexist act.”57 According to Xharra, the hijab has become someone’s agenda and what worries her the most is “the primitiveness of some who want to sell the handcuffing of a woman as freedom of expression.”

On his social media account on Facebook, Kastriot Myftaraj has posted a series of posts in 2020 mocking and spreading slanders against the imam Elvis Naçi, his family members (his wife and mother), and the imam Osman Musliu. Myftaraj called Musliu an Arabic-speaking Turkophile and an Albanian speaker who has no connection with Albania, except that he declared himself Albanian in the censuses of the population in Northern Macedonia due to the fact that in his mosque, “without any concern, even with pride,” he recites the call for prayer for the Albanian believers five times a day in Arabic.

Regarding the imam Naçi, Myftaraj created conspiracy theories such as connections with Greece; connections with powerful, rich people and politicians; and stories regarding the imam’s “obscure” past, which according to Myftaraj he has very strong reasons to hide. He called him “a minority, uneducated imam, and paid by Wahhabi circles” and also a “philanthropist with the money of others, a luxury beggar on behalf of the poor, miserable, and people in need.”

Anton Zefi is known on the Internet as the “radical Catholic” and in the past he was wanted by the authorities for insulting Albanian Muslims. On November 22, he posted another video on TikTok with hate speech towards the Kosovo Albanian “hero” Adem Jashari and his family, who was one of the founders of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA), and with blasphemous content towards Allah and the Prophet Muhammed.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

In September 2020, the author Ilda Londo and the Albanian Media Institute (Instituti Shqiptar i Medias) published the research paper “Hate Speech, Propaganda, and Disinformation in Albanian Media” under the regional project “Resilience: Civil Society Efforts to Consolidate Media Freedom and Fight Disinformation and Hate Propaganda in the Western Balkans and Turkey.” The project was organized with the support of the European Union and partner organizations SEENPM, Albanian Media Institute, Media Centar Sarajevo, Kosovo 2.0, Montenegrin Media Institute, Macdonian Media Institute, Novi Sad School of Journalism, Peace Institute, and Bianet.66

When discussing hate speech, the research paper does not mention Islamophobia or anti-Muslim propaganda. The main focus of the paper was first on the LGBT community and second on the Roma.

The section “Influence and propaganda from other countries in the Albanian media” mentions that “some online media show some closeness and connection with other countries, mainly with Turkey and Iran. Although these media outlets do not have influence, they display hateful tendencies and messages, or publish propaganda materials that support foreign countries, and denigrate their rivals or political opponents.”67 This is followed by a list of three media outlets with a brief description, namely Gazeta Impakt, ePerditshmja.com, Frekuenc.net. Those portals are owned by Muslim public figures and project a Muslim-friendly and Turkish-friendly agenda.
According to this paper, these media “contains pro-Turkey pro-Muslim; pro-Islamic, against Islamophobia propaganda.” 68

The most prominent Islamophobic individuals currently active in Albania have been mentioned throughout this report: the journalists Arbana Xharra, Mustafa Nano and Kastriot Myftaraj.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

There are no organized political initiatives to counter Islamophobia in Albania. However, some NGOs and news portals like the Muslim Forum of Albania, the League of Albanian Imams, Observer.al, Muslimania.al, Gazeta Impakt, Teshesi.com, and Mexhlisi.com monitor and report anti-Muslim hate speech.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

There are certain developments in the context of discrimination and hate speech discourse, as well as attempts to fulfill the international standards that have been published as recommendations from the relevant EU institutions and agencies. In this regard many seminars are organized and reports are written with the main focus on hate speech. However, Islamophobia is not mentioned nor is it recognized as a crucial part of the hate speech discourse. Anti-Muslim propaganda must be recognized and included as an important aspect of discrimination and hate speech discourse. As we saw in the case of the report by the Albanian Institute of Media “Resilience: Civil Society Efforts to Consolidate Media Freedom and Fight Disinformation and Hate Propaganda in the Western Balkans and Turkey” when it comes to hate speech, the focal point of the narrative is the LGBT community and the Roma. Similarly, the Ombudsman of Albania Erinda Ballanca attended an online conference on the topic “Hate Speech and Discrimination in Online Media and Television” organized by the group Pro LGBT with the support of the German Federal Foreign Office.69 During the event, Ballanca emphasized that the language of communication or expression through these means of communication, contains elements of hatred and insult, especially towards individuals belonging to vulnerable or most disadvantaged groups in Albanian society such as “women, Roma and Egyptians, LGBT, people with disabilities, etc.” 70 Ballanca largely ignored the anti-Muslim discourse in Albania.

The report “Internet Governance in Albania and Its Role in Media Freedom” published by the Balkan Investigative Reporting Network (BIRN)71 founded by the EU, has a whole section on hate speech, which of course, again focuses on the hate speech directed “against groups or communities, in particular Roma and other ethnic minorities, the LGBTQ+ community and women,”72 and makes no mention of Islamophobia.

To conclude, we suggest the following recommendations:

• Muslim NGOs and other civil society organizations should cooperate more closely to address the issue of Islamophobia.
• Muslim NGOs, in particular, should cooperate more closely and come up with a common action plan to address the issue of Islamophobia in various fields.
• Media should avoid the use of anti-Muslim stereotypes to the maximum extent possible. They should also avoid reporting unverified news on Muslims and should correct any fake news in this regard.
• The authorities in Albania should investigate any hate crime against people or sites. They should also monitor, officially recognize, and address the continuous hate speech incidents in the media and social media, especially when the perpetrators are prominent public figures.

Executive Summary

In January, a new coalition government was formed by the ÖVP and the Greens. The ÖVP was able to continue consistently its Islam policies that had already started during its coalition with the FPÖ. The battle against so-called political Islam became a “top priority.” The Documentation Center for Political Islam was established in July and in December, the first report was presented to the public. The COVID-19 pandemic hit Austria quite hard. Consequently, there was a historical high unemployment rate that especially afflicted the working poor, many amongst them people of color. On November 9, a raid took place against 30 alleged “terrorists” under the slogan of fighting political Islam, which targeted scholars like me as well as aid organizations, traumatizing children and damaging public reputation. In July 2021, the raid was declared unlawful. Following an attack on November 2 and the unrelated raid one week later, Chancellor Sebastian Kurz (ÖVP) suggested making political Islam a criminal offense. A new anti-terrorist package is planned for spring 2021, although a parliamentary investigative commission came to the conclusion that the legal framework was sufficient to tackle such atrocities and pointed to the apparent failure of the secret service to prevent the attack and to take appropriate steps. This package includes a new anti-terrorist law and amendments to the Islam Act, the Citizenship Right Act, the Symbol Act, and the act governing so-called Confessional Communities (Bekenntnisgemeinschaften). In December, the hijab ban was lifted by the Austrian Constitutional Court, which ruled that the ban in elementary schools was unconstitutional because it violated the principle of equality in conjunction with the right to freedom of religion.

Introduction

On January 7, 2020, the new coalition government of the conservative ÖVP and the Greens was inaugurated in what the New York Times rightly called an “unlikely partnership.” As part of the coalition program, both parties basically agreed to continue the Islam policies of the former government of the ÖVP and the far-right FPÖ, while the Greens were able to soften some proclamations in the government program, which did not have a serious impact in the implemented policies. According to Chancellor Kurz, the battle against “political Islam” was a “top priority.” The Greens and the ÖVP agreed to introduce a Documentation Center to target religious extremism (which was originally presented and finally implemented as the Documentation Center for Political Islam), while the Greens were able to include the goal to have an “Action Plan Against Right-Wing Extremism.” While the Documentation Center for Political Islam was highly subsidized and implemented in 2021, the Action Plan is still waiting to be implemented. Despite the fact that Chancellor Sebastian Kurz was free to choose candidates for the national parliament in 2017 before he came to power with the FPÖ, the old system that privileges the party’s constituent associations and the emerging regional influences on the party resurfaced. In many ways, even before the awareness regarding the threat posed by COVID-19 initiated the first lockdown on March 16, the strategy of the coalition was based on creating “crises.” As journalist Stefan Weiss said, the ÖVP and the Greens have been repeating over and over again the urgency of challenging two crises: climate (The Greens) and migration (ÖVP). Wiess stated, “The coalition needs the crisis as a permanent condition to keep voters in line.” Following the first lockdown, a surprisingly large rally was held to support the Black Lives Matter movement, also including a major Muslim participation. More than 50,000 people gathered in the city of Vienna and around 100,000 in all major cities. But following the end of the first lockdown in summer, Austria managed the COVID-19 pandemic quite unprofessionally, leading the country to become the worst hit country on a global scale at the end of the year in regards to the rising number of newly infected people per capita. Chancellor Sebastian Kurz blamed this on people returning back from their original countries after vacations (i.e., the racialized whites from the Balkans).\(^7\) In this way, he racialized the COVID-19 pandemic, which he did not do in the case of privileged skiing sports centers in Ischgl/Tyrolia, which became a hotspot of COVID-19 dissemination throughout Europe. Beyond this racialization, as a consequence of the pandemic, there was a historical high unemployment rate,\(^8\) which affected to a greater extent the working poor and people of color.

There was also a steep rise in the purchase of weapons alongside these developments. Between March and August, 22,000 more weapons were purchased compared to the year before. Also, 5,000 more people registered for the use of weapons. While six years ago, Austrians owned 838,000 weapons, today, there are 1,132,000 weapons in private hands and the number of registered weapon owners increased from 240,000 to 320,000.\(^9\) According to a study by the SORA Institute, authoritarian views increased. According to SORA, about 38 percent would like to see an “illiberal democracy” (a term coined by Hungarian prime minister Viktor Orbán) and many more are following far-right discourses.\(^10\) At the same time, the rise in right-wing extremist acts leading to a total of 797 acts was not seen as a reason to tackle this problem. MP Sabine Schatz (SPÖ) urged the reintroduction of a report on right-wing extremism with no success.\(^11\)

Following the attack on November 2 by a former sympathizer of Daesh/ISIL, Chancellor Sebastian Kurz initially reacted in a very reasonable and statesmanlike manner, but soon turned to blaming not Jihadism or the failure of the secret service, but so-called political Islam. While the parliamentary investigative commission came to the conclusion that the legal framework was sufficient to tackle such atrocities,\(^12\) the government pushed for a further securitization of Muslims by suggesting making political Islam a criminal offense and changing several legislations such as the already widely criticized Islam Act of 2015,\(^13\) which will be presented to parliament in 2021.

A raid was carried out that was designed to hit “political Islam” and alleged terrorists on November 9, but, in fact, only targeted aid organizations and outspoken critics of the government’s Islam policies like me. Chancellor Sebastian Kurz made clear that the fight against so-called political Islam was his top priority. Two days following the raid, he said, “We have to fight two challengers: First, the corona pandemic and second the even stronger fight against terrorism and radicalization in Austria and Europe.”

A rather good development was that the hijab ban, which was introduced in primary schools in 2019, was overturned by the Austrian Constitutional Court in December 2020. The Constitutional Court found the headscarf ban in elementary schools to be unconstitutional because it violated the principle of equality in conjunction with the right to freedom of religion. The court’s brief opinion refers to the values of openness and tolerance guaranteed in Article 14 of the Federal Constitutional Law, embodied in the requirement to treat different religious and ideological convictions in accordance with the principle of equality. The Constitutional Court stated that particularly in Austria’s state-organized education sector, the adherence to these constitutionally prescribed values is essential.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

The civil society organization Dokustelle Muslime documented xy cases of anti-Muslim incidents in 2019. The majority consists of the spread of hate (xy cases), followed by 118 cases of insult, discrimination (xy cases), and others. According to the NGO ZARA, 812 anti-Muslim hate crimes were documented, which is more than double the number of 2019 with 385 cases.

Following the militant attacks, ZARA and the Dokumentationsstelle Islamfeindlichkeit monitored 60 cases of anti-Muslim hate crime, especially hate crimes targeting women who wear the hijab. Due to COVID-19, the number of online hate crimes increased. The regional Anti-Discrimination Styria (Antidiskriminierungstelle Steier...

After the first lockdown to manage the COVID-19 pandemic, which started on March 16, Austria seemed to be doing fairly well. Following the summer, however, Austria soon became one of the worst hit countries on a global scale. This development was accompanied by a historical high unemployment rate. More than 171,000 people - in other words, a third of half a million people - have been without a job for more than a year.22 In a society insensitive to racial injustice, one can only imagine the extent of the repercussions of the economic crisis on people of color and amongst them Muslims.

Education and Science

After a hijab ban was introduced in primary schools in 2019, the Austrian Constitutional Court overturned the ban in December 2020. The Constitutional Court found the headscarf ban in elementary schools to be unconstitutional because it violated the principle of equality in conjunction with the right to freedom of religion. The court’s brief opinion refers to the values of openness and tolerance guaranteed in Article 14 of the Federal Constitutional Law, embodied in the requirement to treat different religious and ideological convictions in accordance with the principle of equality. Particularly in Austria’s state-organized education sector, the adherence to these constitutionally prescribed values is essential.23

As in past years, the Austrian Integration Fund (ÖIF), which has been using its platform to promote anti-Muslim views through speakers and reports,24 continued producing one-sided reports. A study of 18 mosques in the city of Graz conducted by the ÖIF between December 2019 and July 2020 was criticized as not bearing the standards of good academic work by academic Wolfgang Benedek, head of the Department of International Law at the University of Graz. Later in 2020, the Austrian Court of Audit (Rechnungshof) criticized now Chancellor Sebastian Kurz for the commissioned study on Islamic kindergartens.

A two-year study of Koran schools in Upper Austria began in August 2020 with the participation of the University of Linz, the Teachers Training College, the ÖIF, and the IGGÖ (Islamische Glaubensgemeinschaft in Österreich, Islamic Religious Community in Austria). Stefan Kaineder (Greens) argued that the study will be conducted in a non-stereotypical way, “not assuming there were extremist movements” involved. Kaineder also criticized the Ministry of Integration’s unwillingness to participate in the research. In an interview with activist Rami Ali, the latter stated that the “ÖVP has no credibility when it comes to academic autonomy” referring to previous studies commissioned by the ÖIF and conducted by scholars with closeness to the ÖVP.

On February 4, 2020, during a panel organized by the ÖIF, Pascal Bruckner, who authored the book Un racisme imaginaire – La Querelle de l’islamophobie (An Imaginary Racism: The Quarrel over Islamophobia), claimed that the “term Islamophobia was invented to silence the critiques of a religion” and that “a society has to distinguish between moderate, liberal Muslims, and radical ones. And we have to support enlightened preachers, imams, and intellectuals with interpreting the Koran in a sophisticated way.” According to another panelist, political science graduate Nina Scholz, Islamophobia was a means of political Islam to prevent liberal Muslims’ reforms. Scholz stated, “Political Islam strives to take over the Muslim community in Europe. In the process, ideas for reform or justified criticism are immediately dismissed wholesale as ‘Islamophobic.’”

The political academy of the FPÖ in Vienna (Freiheitliche Akademie Wien) organized a panel on “political Islam” on February 13, 2020 featuring the ex-Jihadist and then secret service agent Irfan Peci, Viennese FPÖ party leader Dominik Nepp, Maximilian Krauss from the academy, and FPÖ politician Stefan Berger.31

On the second day in power, the Integration Minister Susanne Raab (ÖVP) stated that she considered it a high priority to establish the Documentation Center for Political Islam within the first 100 days of the party’s governance.32 In an interview with Der Standard, Minister of Integration Raab defined political Islam in the following way: “This is an ideological, extremist current that wants to infiltrate our society, democracy, the rule of law, and our constitutional values such as equality between men and women. However, it must be clearly distinguished from Islam as a religion.”33 Der Standard journalist Barbara Coudenhove-Kalergi criticized the way this term is used to “subliminally target the world religion of Islam as such. But groups (…), which advocate the rule of law and gender equality, are also part of political Islam. And Christianity is also political. The pope is political. The Gospel is political. The Ten Commandments are political (…) Do we really have to watch helplessly as (…) girls who wear headscarves of their own free will and out of pride in their identity are forced to, as they say, ‘undress’?”34

Following attacks by youngsters against a demonstration in Brigittenau/Vienna, Minister of Integration Raab argued for the need to take action against parallel societies and that Austria still had a chance not to become like Britain and France.35 While Ümit Vural, president of the IGGÖ, declared that these incidents were not religious, but were the long arm of Turkish domestic politics and had no place in Austria,36 the incidents were framed by ÖVP politicians as an issue of political Islam. According to integration affairs spokesman Ernst Gödl (ÖVP), the Documentation Center for Political Islam had the mission to analyze such incidents: “The task of this independent body will be to investigate the background of escalations of violence, associations, structures, and backers as well as possible influences from abroad, because political Islam is a serious danger for our social coexistence in Austria.”37 He further explained that for the first time in Austria, there is a center that “independently and scientifically deals with the dangerous ideology of political Islam and offers insights into the previously hidden networks. With the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam, Austria becomes a pioneer in Europe.”38

On July 15, 2020, the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam was made public in a press release. In contrast to the coalition program that spoke about a “Documentation Center for religiously motivated political extremism,” the name of the center in the end only contained “political Islam.” The center has a yearly budget of €500,000. The Documentation Center was presented to the public by Minister of Integration Susanne Raab, theologian Mouhanad Khorchide, and the so-called expert on extremism Lorenzo Vidino.39 Muslim activist Tarafa Baghajati questioned the academic quality of Vidino. On July 16, 2020, the position of the director of the Documentation Center was advertised for the next five years with a monthly salary of €4,443.90. Qualifications for the position of director include a minimum of a master’s degree.40 According to the mission statement, the Documentation Center, which is legally a state fund, is directed towards monitoring movements that do not pose a security-related threat. It is designed to be preventive and informative, and is “part of the national strategy of extremism prevention and deradicalization.”41 In November 2020, former ÖIF employee, Lisa Fellhofer, became director and Mouhanad Khorchide became the head of the scientific advisory board, which has eight members.42 The board includes some of the most well-known anti-Muslim authors like Susanne Schröter,43 Lorenzo Vidino44 and Heiko Heinisch.45

According to Minister Raab, the Documentation Center allows “for the first time in Austria, (…) to independently and scientifically deal with the dangerous ideology of political Islam and offer insights into the previously hidden networks.”46 Raab further argues, “Because political Islam is poison for our social coexistence and must be fought with all means. With the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam, Austria becomes a pioneer in Europe.”

Raab wants to have an annual report on extremism as well as the “creation of an overview map of problematic networks and associations in Austria that can be attributed to political Islam. The aim is to make visible structures, actors, and goals of the representatives of this dangerous ideology. Financial, organizational, and ideological connections (abroad) are also to be investigated and disclosed.” The Documentation Center ought also to present a “detailed analysis of the individual networks operating in secret.” During the presentation, Khorchide argued that political Islam is “wrapped with a cloak of democracy.” He further suggested that the proponents of political Islam would engage in taqiyya - dissimulation or denial of religious belief in the face of persecution - by masking their “inwardly” values.

While Raab reaffirmed that this monitoring center was not directed against Islam as a religion, activists like Tarafa Baghajati argued that this might become an “institution of surveillance” directed against political participation and political voices. Integration spokesman Nikolaus Kunrath (The Greens) contested that the mandate for the Documentation Center was much larger than the focus on political Islam. The IGGÖ called on the Documentation Center for close cooperation. Nadim Mazarweh, head of the IGGÖ’s Unit for Prevention of Extremism and De-radicalization (Kontaktstelle für Extremismusprävention und Deradikalisierung), said, “No one has comparable access to all associations and no one can communicate similarly efficiently with those who may be affected. If the faith community (IGGÖ) were to be ignored again, this would reinforce the existing concern that there is in fact a general suspicion towards all Muslims and the religion of Islam.” A few days later, on July 22, the IGGÖ stated that under the unspecific notion of “political Islam” and due to the identified experts that are hostile to the IGGÖ, it would not be able to cooperate with the Documentation Center. Minister Raab then reframed the IGGÖ’s distance as a “refusal to talk.” One day later, the president of the Austrian National Council Wolfgang Sobotka (ÖVP) demanded that Austria’s Muslims acknowledge the constitution. He also claimed to want to “empower a laicist Islam.”

47. Ibid.
48. Ibid.
Sobotka mentioned the Jewish prayer book Siddur as a positive example of a confession to the state and its representatives and supported the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam. In a critical op-ed, Der Standard journalist Jan Michael Marchart criticized Sobotka for this move and the general suspicion, he claims against ordinary Muslims. For Green MP Faika El-Nagashi, Sobotka’s words were “absolutely inacceptable,” since they were stigmatizing. Rami Ali criticized the “authoritarian discourse” regarding Muslims in Austria. During the presentation of the center, Vidino called the Documentation Center a “pioneering effort.” Khorchide claimed that this center was not directed against common Muslims, but against the “dangerous ideology of political Islam.” In an interview with the weekly Profil, Amina Baghajati from the IGGÖ said that her “problem” with Mouhanad Khorchide was that “he allows to be misused. His last statements in Vienna sound like those of the spokesperson of the Ministry of Integration.” For her, Chancellor Sebastian Kurz and Minister Susanne Raab “represent the FPÖ in a smarter way.” Vice Chancellor Werner Kogler (The Greens) supported the inclusion of Muslims in the center. In an op-ed in the Wiener Zeitung, I criticized the Documentation Center as an institutionalization of criminalizing Muslim civil society. Several questions were asked regarding the Documentation Center for Political Islam in the national parliament by different MPs from several opposition parties such as the NEOS and the SPÖ.

In June 2020, Minister of Integration Susanne Raab met with Lower Austrian Governor Thomas Stelzer to agree on cooperation in the fight against political Islam. Using the usual propagandic terms of the ÖVP government, the governor is quoted as saying, “Integration is one of the central tasks for the future. The fact is: parallel societies and the influence of political Islam must have no place in our country.” Raab argued, “I make a clear distinction between the religion of Islam and the dangerous ideology of political Islam. The planned Documentation Center will fill an existing gap and help us uncover ideological networks in association structures, but also on the Internet, and especially in social networks.”

In an interview with the ÖVP-owned Volksblatt, Khorchide defined political Islam as “the attempt to restructure our society according to values that contradict the liberal democratic order.” He went on to say that “religiously motivated political engagement is welcome” but that the latter “was not political Islam.” The first report on political Islam that was released on December 23, explicitly mentions the aforementioned kind of political engagement. All the criteria used to define political Islam, such as patriarchy and polarization, cannot be found in the organizations mentioned in the report.

Before the COVID-19 pandemic, the ÖIF conducted a survey according to which 70 percent of respondents believe that there are parallel societies in Austria. The only problem that ranks higher in the attitudes of the respondents is the abuse of drugs and alcohol. Minister Susanne Raab used the outcome of the survey to support her project to combat political Islam.

In its annual report on anti-Muslim racism in Austrian politics, SOS Mitmensch documented and analyzed 21 cases. While the report for 2018 exclusively covered politicians of the FPÖ, this report also included examples from the ÖVP such as Ministers Karoline Edtstadler and Gernot Blümel.

Politics

When the new government was inaugurated, it presented several policies to regulate Islam and Muslims. The ÖVP is in charge of the integration ministry and the newly created integration ministry, which is also in charge of churches and religious communities. The coalition program defines Austria in an exclusionary way as a “cosmopolitan country coined by Christianity.” One of the eight goals of the program is to have a consistent migration and integration policy, which essentially means a restrictive policy vis-à-vis the otherized. Austria’s foreign minister reiterated that Austria will not join the United Nations’ Global Compact for Safe, Orderly and Regular Migration. In the first week following the inauguration of the government, Austria’s integration minister stated that the ban of the hijab for pupils up to 14 years old was a top priority to be implemented within the first 100 days of governance. Both positions reflect a seamless transition from the coalition with the far-right to a coalition with the Greens.71 According to the Minister of Interior Karl Nehammer the ban is “a decisive step toward better integration and a reduction in discrimination. We are thus ensuring that the integration opportunities of young girls increase.”72 Raab has also become in charge of women affairs in the Chancellery, while there was no ministry of women affairs. The sole association between women affairs and integration (of immigrants) was criticized heavily by the head of the umbrella organization for Austrian women’s associations (Dachverband für österreichischen Frauenvereine), who argued that “equal rights, the struggle for economic independence and against patriarchal violence concerns all women living in Austria.” The Austrian women’s association also criticized the ÖVP-FPÖ government for reducing support for women associations.73

Many of the policies mentioned in the coalition’s program are based on ideas and initiatives that had already been started during the coalition of the People’s Party (ÖVP) with the far-right Freedom Party (FPÖ). One is to establish a monitoring center that focuses on what they call “political Islam.” This term is nothing but a euphemism for the religion of Islam. In the past, the ban of the hijab in kindergarten and primary school and the attempt to close down mosques (which was later ruled illegal by the Viennese Administration Court) were both legitimized with reference to combatting “political Islam.” The program of the old coalition foresaw that the interior ministry’s security service should write a report on political extremism focusing on “political Islam” in addition to the already existing one. Criminal law should in the future include “political Islam” — a notion yet undefined — as a criminal offence. At the same time, the office for cultural affairs, which now has become part of the ministry of integration, should be equipped with police powers, not only monitoring religious institutions, but also giving them the power to close civil organizations.

Like no other coalition program before, the current one is one-sidedly targeting Muslim educational institutions. It says that especially Muslim kindergartens, Muslim school boarding houses, and Muslim private schools should be controlled. The training of religious teachers is only dealt with in regards to Muslim school education. Eytan Reif has criticized the one-sided support of the Catholic Church by the government and analyzed why the government is planning to intervene in the affairs of the religious education of Muslims. The IGGÖ criticized the aim to control specifically Islamic religious education in public schools. Also, the Protestant Church criticized the government’s approach of singling out Muslims in their policies. While the hijab is planned to be banned for Muslim schoolgirls up to 14 years old, neither the Sikh nor the Jewish community are affected by any regulation of religious garments. According to the government, the “task of the state is to empower girls and young women and support them in their self-development.”

The coalition program also suggested to renew the Islam Act of 2015, which had already been criticized as being discriminatory. According to the IGGÖ, the coalition program reflected a “hostile attitude” which was a continuation of the former coalition between the ÖVP and the FPÖ. The IGGÖ feared a stigmatization and criminalization of Muslims when the government uses terms such as “political Islam.” Minister of Interior Karl Nehammer replied saying that “[r]eligious freedom is important and therefore remains untouched, of course. However, it is absolutely clear that political Islam is a danger.”

FPÖ politician Vilimsky called for a “Mohamed-free Vienna.”80 The Viennese FPÖ education spokesperson Maximilian Krauss demanded the dismissal of university lecturer Rami Ali at the University of Vienna due to alleged closeness to the Muslim Brotherhood arguing that “Rami Ali and his family milieu are open sympathizers of the radical Islamic Muslim Brotherhood and hence a danger to our society. This alone is a reason to remove this person from the University of Vienna.”81 During a party convention on June 16, 2020, FPÖ chairman Norbert Hofer said that “Corona is not dangerous. The Koran is much more dangerous.”82 On May 20, 2020, Vienna FPÖ leader Dominik Nepp mobilized against the “government burqa”83 (Regierungsburka) for making the wearing of masks against COVID-19 compulsory in certain places. The president of the IGGÖ asked the FPÖ chairman to apologize for his words, which for him were sedition and vilification.84 Several Muslim organizations and opposition politicians like Christian Deutsch (SPÖ) spoke of “viliifying, scandalous words vis-à-vis the Islamic religious community.” 85 According to the FPÖ, these Muslim organizations would all be Islamists and the IGGÖ should be outlawed.86 To be sued, Norbert Hofer’s immunity would have had to be lifted, which did not happen.87

In September 2020, Andreas Mailath-Pokorny (SPÖ), president of the Union of Social Democratic Scholars (BSA), criticized an election poster of the FPÖ which showed “that traditionally dressed persons belonging to the Muslim faith in Austria are in any case in favor of radical, armed and militant Islam.” According to Mailath-Pokorny, the FPÖ tramples on human rights and religious freedom.88

The Viennese FPÖ declared that the SPÖ, the ÖVP, and the Greens stand for “radical Islam,” while the chairman of the Viennese FPÖ stands for “Our Home.” (Fig. 2)

The chairman of the Viennese FPÖ Dominik Nepp claimed that the IGGÖ was part of political Islam. He stated that “legalistic Islamists are at work in the IGGÖ. They want to impose an Islamic state by peaceful means.” Legalistic Islamism is a term used to describe Muslims who are working peacefully in a democratic society by alleging they have a hidden agenda of Islamizing the country. Chairman Hofer then claimed that he was threatened on social media and needed police protection.

In its election campaign in Vienna, the FPÖ focused as usual on migration and security policies. Party leader Dominik Nepp argued against the coalition of the SPÖ and the Greens in Vienna: “The conditions in Favoriten (10th district) show us how much radical Islam is spreading in Vienna. This problem is homemade - for example through the promotion of Islamist associations by the red-green (Social Democratic and Green) city government.” He went on to say, “For years, people looked the other way, but now parallel cultures have been established and have developed into countercultures.”

Legislation

Asked by the daily Österreich regarding her top priorities, Raab stated, “Political Islam has no place in Austria; there is zero tolerance from my side. That is why I would like to launch a Documentation Center for Political Islam in the first 100 days.” When the journalist further asked if political Islam was such a large problem in Austria, Raab answered, “Absolutely. Especially due to strong migration movements from very patriarchal cultures in recent years, there are influences that we have to counteract. A recent study by Kenan Güngör shows that for 55% of Afghan youth in Vienna, Islam is above Austrian law. And we know that there are extremist tendencies in Islamic associations and the social media that need to be closely monitored.” Asked further about the hijab ban, Raab defended the ban with the following words, “Because every girl who is forced to wear a headscarf is one too many. But, of course, this requires good legal preparation.” Since the ban in elementary school was already challenged in the Constitutional Court, the journalist asked Raab, if she was confident that the ban will stay. She answered, “From my point of view, the ban was absolutely the right step. We have received a lot of posi-

ative feedback from the teaching staff and also from Muslim women, who are happy to have support on this issue.” Raab also claimed that Muslim mothers would support her. During a panel, Raab stated, “We do not want to have children wear a headscarf in Austria. Especially in schools, we want to give girls a free space to develop.” She was also supported by Justice Minister Alma Zadic (The Greens): “There should not be a situation in which girls are forced to wear a headscarf.” ÖVP-affiliated Zana Ramadani argued that the hijab was a “purely sexist, political symbol,” which also discriminates against men, because the hijab “insinuates to all men that they are sex offenders because they suddenly ‘see’ female hair.” Anti-Muslim spokespersons like Seyran Ates attempted to support the anti-Muslim policies and the framing of the ÖVP-led government: “Adolescents are in the sphere of power of parents and family clans. That is why it is so important that these girls have at least one space, namely school, where they can try out what it is like not to be covered.” Former Minister of Interior Herbert Kickl (FPÖ) had mentioned that he had visited Seyran Ates, whom he sees as a “declared opponent” of the hijab: “She sees the headscarf as not rooted in religion and interprets it as a means of political expression.”

The Austrian National Youth Council criticized a ban of the hijab and claimed that “it is wrong to exclude women wearing a hijab from the public sphere.” Also, the Catholic Family Association (Katholischer Familienverband) criticized the hijab ban on two respects: “on the one hand, the protection of the child and on the other hand, the adult woman’s mature practice of religion.” Governor of Burgenland, Hans Peter Doskozil (SPÖ), who represents the rightist camp of his party, supported the government’s hijab ban.\textsuperscript{107} Opposition came also from within the ranks of the ÖVP. The ÖVP Tyrolia’s executive education Landesräthin Beate Palfrader argued that such a ban would not be necessary. Following the hijab ban in elementary school, there was only one case, where the school had to talk to the parents. The afternoon of the same day, she backtracked and announced “no resistance to the government program” and emphasized that “the hijab is a symbol of oppression.”\textsuperscript{108} The leader of the FPÖ, Norbert Hofer, said he would be happy on the historic day that the Greens stand up and decide in favor of a hijab ban in parliament.

In Salzburg, the ÖVP executive education Landesräthin Maria Hutter (ÖVP) supported the ban. Governor Peter Kaiser (SPÖ) and executive education Landesrat Jürgen Czernohorszky (SPÖ) called the initiative a “distraction maneuver.”\textsuperscript{109} In an op-ed, Maria Rösslhumer stated that while women are still victims of violence (one in five experience physical or sexual violence), the government talks about the hijab ban, political Islam, and does not recognize that violence against women is a home-made problem and has no nationality.\textsuperscript{110}

On January 14, 2020, Minister of Integration Raab said she could imagine introducing a hijab ban for teachers in school. According to her, there was a “broad consensus” in the coalition. According to the ÖVP’s election program for the 2019 National Council elections, female teachers must comply with a so-called neutrality requirement. The program states, “A headscarf is a clearly visible, demonstrative symbol that can influence students politically. Therefore, it should be forbidden for all female teachers to wear a headscarf at school in the future.”\textsuperscript{111} Vice-chancellor and the Greens leader Werner Kogler clearly refuted these claims and stated that his party was not behind such a ban.\textsuperscript{112} Social democrat MP Nurten Yılmaz criticized Raab’s claim as a “non-integration policy” and “continuation of the ÖVP-FPÖ.”\textsuperscript{113} Federal President Alexander Van der Bellen argued that “it is more important what somebody has in her head rather than on her head”¹¹⁴ – a statement he said he had heard from a professor at a world-renowned university. The Cardinal of Austria Christoph Schönborn argued that a pluralist society accepts different religious symbols in the public space.¹¹⁵ Even after the first wave of the lockdown, Raab declared that “the pandemic does not change anything regarding the hijab ban.”¹¹⁶

Following the inception of the Documentation Center for Political Islam, former minister of interior (FPÖ) and second chairman of the FPÖ, Herbert Kickl, urged the introduction of a “criminal law against political Islam.”¹¹⁷ This claim was already part of the coalition program of the previous government of the ÖVP and the FPÖ, and was also included in the coalition program of the ÖVP and the Greens. Following the militant attack on November 2, Chancellor Sebastian Kurz announced the intention to make political Islam a criminal offence.¹¹⁸

On October 22, 2020, Minister of Defense Klaudia Tanner (ÖVP) asked the IGGÖ to dismiss its Military Imam in the Austrian Army, because he had shown sympathy with the Jihadist movement in Bosnia. In the media, Tanner said that the cooperation ended here. According to a report in the daily Krone based on “investigations” of a former Jihadist and then informant for the German secret service, İrfan Peci, the imam had pressed the “like” button under an image on Facebook which showed a former general of the Yugoslavian army, who was an alleged war criminal. Following this, the military spokesperson of the FPÖ urged the minister to dismiss him.¹¹⁹ Since his contract was with the IGGÖ,¹²⁰ while the IGGÖ publicly criticized the Minister of Defense,¹²¹ they urged the imam to resign in consensus, which he did,¹²² although the alleged war criminal was no war criminal and had even been invited by the Austrian state several times. The alleged war criminal was, in fact, acquitted of all charges in The Hague and was only accused of war crimes in Serbia.
Following the militant attack in Vienna on November 4, Chancellor Sebastian Kurz did not mobilize against the Jihadist threat that led to the murder of four, but against political Islam: “The EU must fight political Islam, which is the basis of this terrorism, and Islamist terrorism much more resolutely.” Kurz further named Emmanuel Macron as his ally. Mouhanad Khorchide and Heiko Heinisch immediately supported the will to combat political Islam alongside Jihadist movements. Heinisch stated, “Therefore, what distinguishes this political Islam from Jihadism is the violence, the basic ideology is the same.” Nina Scholz published an op-ed in Der Standard, where she argued that “not only Jihadists, but also legalistic Islamists, who dominate organized Muslims, separate the world into Muslims and non-Muslims, idealize an Islamic world community, propagate Islamist supremacy, and refuse liberal democracy, general human rights and the separation of religion and state. Jihadists can build on this propaganda.” According to a report by the Financial Times, “France and Austria have pushed for the EU to agree tough common language on Islamist terrorism” following three deadly attacks. According to the Financial Times, the declaration “has been significantly watered down compared with the original draft,” removing the mention of Islam, proposals of sanctioning migrants who refuse to integrate, and toning down rhetoric on EU values.

On November 9, a raid took place that had been prepared for more than a year and which was not related to the militant attack a week before – although it allegedly focused on “terrorists.” The raid was brutal: it occurred at 5 a.m. and also targeted family members including kids, who were woken up by special forces. As many reported, the children were heavily traumatized by the raid. I was also a victim of this raid. While lawyers had no access to the files for the first three months, which is very uncommon in Austrian jurisdiction, according to the law there was only a “compacted suspicion,” which means there is no indictment against any of the 30 raided persons. There was also no provisional detention, although the secret services conducted observation for more than 1.5 years and over a total of 21,000
The people who were taken for interrogation were asked questions such as the following: How many non-Muslim friends do you have? Do you visit a mosque and if yes, which mosque? What do you think about the caliphate? What do you think about peace with Israel? Should children raised in Austria be educated to become martyrs? Do you want to introduce Sharia? Do you know the Protocols of the Elders of Zion? What do you understand by the term “Islamophobia”? In your opinion, is this term justified? If so, please explain why and what do you understand by this term? Are Muslims suppressed in Austria? Is Islamist global terrorism possibly the reason for fears emanating from Islam or is it the oppression, especially of women or people of other faiths, by the norms of the Sharia? May your son marry a Christian, unbeliever, or a Jew? Do you designate your son’s spouse? What does the term “Kuffare” (sic) mean for you? Are Christians for you “Kuffare” (sic)? Is one allowed to kill in the name of God? Do you and your wife and your kids observe the prayer times?

The search warrant against me includes three points: I supported the establishment of a private confessional school under public law, which is in fact true and refers to a school project launched by an interreligious board. Second, I spoke to a leader of a political party on the phone and criticized the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam, which is also true and which I also did publicly, as this report proves. The other accusations are unproven lies based on an alleged “informant,” who is not identified in the search warrant. Generally, the search warrant argues that most people whose homes were raided were members of the Muslim Brotherhood, which is characterized as a “terrorist organization,” which it is not according to the Austrian secret service and other EU member states. The search warrant says that as such, the accused people pursue the objective of (1) toppling the Egyptian governing regime of Sisi, (2) destroying Israel, and (3) creating a global caliphate with Jerusalem as its capital. In legal terms, the allegation is that I am a member of a “terrorist, criminal organization, funding terrorism, and money laundering.” The bank accounts and assets of the accused people were all frozen. Later in 2021, the raid, the preceding wiretapping, as well as the freezing of assets were declared unlawful with all suspects that had made a plea.

Two weeks after the raids, I published a short piece on the website of Georgetown University’s “The Bridge Initiative” with the title “Xingjiang and Kristallnacht in Austria: Freedom of Religion under Threat,” which was misrepresented in the Austrian media. Although I did not equalize the Kristallnacht (literally night of the broken glass, which was the start of the pogroms against Jews during the Nazi rule) with the raids, this is what Minister of Interior Karl Nehammer and Minister of Integration Susanne Raab claimed. Nehammer stated, “To equate the Kristallnacht - as one of the first steps towards the genocide of millions of Jews - with the legitimate and determined stand against radical political Islam is not only completely distasteful, but rather an expression of an anti-democratic attitude.” He went on to argue that I would “drive a rift into our society under the guise of science and discredit and thereby weaken our democracy, which has grown since 1945.” Raab stated, “This outrageous comparison trivializes the terrible crimes of National Socialism and equates them with the legitimate and necessary fight against extremism. Anyone who does this has not understood our history and tramples on the memory of the victims of the National Socialist genocide.” Khorchide claimed, “The comparison of the raid against suspected Muslim Brothers with the situation of the Uyghurs in China and, above all, with the November pogroms is not only extremely distasteful and trivializing, but highly scandalous. How can one equate the beginning of the murder of millions of Jews with a raid?” Given the media coverage of Nehammer and the others, I had to make clear in an interview that I never did and intended to equate these incidents. Later, a community leader called me to “step down” from my position at the university. In a column in the weekly Falter, Raimund Löw argued that “[b]y demanding that political Islam be banned altogether, Chancellor Kurz is going beyond the scope of democratically guaranteed freedoms. Criminalization of dissenting opinions is familiar to authoritarian states. We experience the effects when the government sends out anti-terror police against the inconvenient political scientist Farid Hafez, as in Operation Luxor [the name given to the raid] in early November. This is also a consequence of the unfortunate construction of political Islam as a danger to the republic. We should free ourselves from this.”

The Identitarian Movement was renamed “Die Österreicher - DO5,” after it became public that Martin Sellner received money from the Christchurch militant. Under their new name, they organized similar activities against an alleged “Islamization.”

In a critical op-ed, the legal scholar Richard Potz criticized the government’s “tendency to make religious law part of integration and security policy” and especially criticized the increasing state control of the religious education of Muslims and Protestants. According to Potz, the coalition program’s aim to control especially the IGGÖ regarding the ban of foreign funding was in breach of the principle of equality of churches and religious communities. In his analysis of the government’s program, Protestant theologian Bernhard Lauxmann argued,

Religion is assumed to have a tendency toward extremism. The (nonsensical) talk of “political Islam,” which is used synonymously with “religiously motivated extremism” is omnipresent. Thus, it is assumed that Islam and with it any religion may not be political (which, however, is allowed!) and that Islam in general and with it religion in general are close to extremism (which, of course, is not the case!). (…) However, freedom of religion is not primarily or exclusively about freedom from religion, but about freedom of religion. State-enforced neutralization of religion is something different from religious-ideological neutrality of the state, Mr. Chancellor! The secular constitutional state must never behave as a secularizing state. (…) Where religion is mentioned in the program, Islam is primarily meant. But that should not reassure non-Muslims! As far as religion is concerned, the government program is highly questionable, polemical, and tends to be hostile to religion. ... Religion, in general, and Islam, in particular, are widely placed under general suspicion.\(^{142}\)

Der Standard journalist Jan Michael Marchart already argued in February 2020 that the “independent, state-legitimized documentation center for religiously motivated political extremism” that is mentioned in the coalition program is basically targeting “political Islam.” Sociology graduate Kenan Güngör is quoted as a source that legitimizes the existence of the Documentation Center, although he believes that the notion of political Islam is “very vague (…) including everything and nothing (…) from radical to humanistic.”\(^{143}\) Also, the head of the Austrian Institute of International Politics questioned the vagueness of the term. Only the history graduate Heiko Heinisch is quoted as defending the term “political Islam” to include “violent Jihadi organizations and legalistic Islamists,” while the second group refers to those “who act within the democratic state, but want its removal.”\(^{144}\)

When Susanne Raab mentioned her idea to ban the wearing of the hijab for teachers as well, theologian Paul Zulehner spoke of an offensive against the hijab (“Kopftuchkränkung”), which would not help religious freedom in Austria. Such an expansion of the hijab ban would “reinforce racist prejudices that exist in parts of the population.”\(^{145}\) In an op-ed, Menerva Hammad criticized the Islam policies of the government and argued from a feminist perspective that “whoever bans the hijab today will tomorrow regulate the length of your miniskirt.”\(^{146}\) In another op-ed, Sonia Zaafrani criticized the hijab ban as “discriminatory and against equality” and furthermore is a “humiliation enforced by the state.”\(^{147}\)

Newspapers interviewed school principals that supported the hijab ban,\(^ {148}\) and also asked people from the private sector like the jam producer Staud, who dismissed the hijab ban in an interview.\(^ {149}\)
Die Presse journalist Gudula Walterskirchen supported a hijab ban.¹⁵⁰ In a column discussing the pros and cons of an extended hijab ban in school up to 14 years of age, Der Standard journalist Eric Frey argued that “liberal Muslims, who want integration, ought to welcome such a step” and further claimed that in most cases, Muslim girls do not opt to wear the hijab on their own terms, but under the pressure of their parents, peers, and especially Muslim boys. This claim, widely spread, lacks any representative empirical evidence.¹⁵¹ Der Standard journalist Hans Rauscher wrote in his famous op-ed, “Kurz and the Turquoise [the new color of his rebranded Austrian people’ Party, ÖVP] are trying to ‘preserve Austria’s Christian identity’ by harassing Muslims. This betrays a lack of historical and sociopolitical education. And is counterproductive.”¹⁵² In another op-ed, Der Standard journalist Hans Rauscher rightly deconstructed Raab’s claim that the cross was “a clear symbol of Judeo-Christian tradition” as a political spin of the governing new ÖVP.¹⁵³

The daily Kleine Zeitung covered an article published by the ÖVP-owned Oberösterreichisches Volksblatt by Seyran Ates.¹⁵⁴ Ates argued, “How can we as an open civil society accept that a religious community says that as soon as our female members reach sexual maturity, they must cover themselves? That turns the girls into sexual objects.”¹⁵⁵ Another anti-Muslim writer, Saïda Keller-Massahli,¹⁵⁶ also supported the government’s claim by stating, “The public school may be the only place where a Muslim girl can experience freedom and equality. This space must be protected from religious covetousness.”¹⁵⁷ For Keller-Massahli, the complaint against the hijab ban was a “shameless abuse.” Also, the German head of the Department of Islamic Theology and Religious Pedagogy, Abdel-Hakim Ourghi, argued that “religious symbols shall have no place in school.”¹⁵⁸ He is also the author of the book You Don’t Have to Wear a Headscarf (Ihr müsst kein Kopftuch tragen).

¹⁵⁷. “‘Nicht religiös verankert’, Kleine Zeitung.
¹⁵⁸. Ibid.
In an op-ed, Catholic theologian Paul Zulehner argued that the Islam policies of the Austrian government were a “collective insult,” claiming integration, but in fact hindering integration. He further argued that “Muslim denominations and institutions are currently put under surveillance like the Reichsbürger and the Identitarian movement. Also, the world religion of Islam is permanently misrepresented as a threat to our country in a subtle way. We are converging Viktor Orbán. This integration policy of subtle expulsion is embellished with the misnomer of current religion politics: the fight against ‘political Islam’. This is another example of the abuse of language by politics.”

In his op-ed “Politics of Humiliation,” editor-in-chief Otto Friedrich argues that finally under this government, people realize that the horrible positions of the former government that included the far-right FPÖ were actually positions of the ÖVP. The hardliner positions vis-à-vis Islam were “genuine turquoise politics” and “Muslims, refugees, and migrants are humiliated as enemies by the politics of this government.”

I also criticized the government’s Islam policies in an op-ed in Die Presse and argued in another op-ed in the German TAZ: “In sum, it can be said that the government program has a one-sided focus on the group of Muslim religious members. Restrictive policies of controlling their educational institutions reflect the insinuation of hostile attitudes, and corresponding measures are announced. It can be assumed that ‘political Islam’ in the ÖVP’s area of responsibility (Interior and Security) continues to mean not political extremism, but Islam. And thus, the Turquoise-Green government agreement is in seamless continuity with the Turquoise-Blue one.”

For Der Standard journalist Barbara Coudenhove-Kalergi, the Documentation Center for Political Islam sounds more like police than integration. According to Rami Ali, “the notion ‘political Islam’ allows a general suspicion against Muslims and their institutions and allows not to be condemned for racism by arguing that one only targets certain Muslims.”

In an op-ed in Der Standard by history graduate Nina Scholz, she defended the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam arguing that it would...

be of help to journalists, experts, and politicians, and that it would also be a helpful tool for the IGGÖ in order “to identify and exclude Islamist positions from its umbrella organization.”\textsuperscript{165} For Scholz, political Islam means a “fundamentalist ideological movement, which wants to establish Islam as a state and power structure (Herrschaftsform).”\textsuperscript{166} Some journalists supported the establishment of the Documentation Center for Political Islam and its sole focus on so-called political Islam, because “it is not natural to separate the worldly from the religious sphere in Islam.”\textsuperscript{167} Furthermore, they saw this as a necessary step to let “Austria and Europe stay as they are.”\textsuperscript{168} Der Standard journalist Hans Rauscher critically asked whether Minister of Integration Susanne Raab was likely to “speak about Muslims rather than with them.” He also questioned the expertise of Vidino, who had claimed the closeness of the Muslim Youth in Austria (MJÖ, Muslimische Jugend Österreich) to the Muslim Brotherhood without giving any evidence. For him, Raab’s strategy “sounds like confrontation with no clear plan.”\textsuperscript{169} In an interview with theologian Mouhanad Khorchide in Der Standard, the latter, who was introduced as somebody “who supports the government in establishing the Documentation Center for Political Islam”\textsuperscript{170} stated, “Basically, the term describes an anti-human ideology that seeks domination in the name of Islam. Religion serves as a means to manipulate believers. Political Islam is directed against all of us and is much more dangerous than Jihadism and Salafism because it appears much more subtly, namely in a tie and suit. Many politicians I talk to do not see through this yet.”\textsuperscript{171} He also warned that “a strategy of Islamists will be to put pressure on the Greens to terminate the coalition.”\textsuperscript{172} Different voices, old\textsuperscript{173} and new,\textsuperscript{174} came to the fore to legitimize the Documentation Center for Political Islam. In a very contradictory way, Khorchide argued that while political Islam was weak in Austria, it was still dangerous, because he fears that “values of freedom and human rights are relativized.”\textsuperscript{175} Khorchide argued in an interview that “terms like Islamophobia and anti-Muslim racism have become combat terms of political Islam.”176

Elias Feroz argued in an op-ed that the notion of political Islam was useless for a factual debate. He criticized Khorchide’s new book God’s False Attorneys (Gottes falsche Anwälte), where the author argued that “the members of political Islam are often well-integrated, well-educated and have civil courage, confess to Europe and distance from extremism (…) but do this only to grab power.”177

Natascha Strobl argued in a critical piece for momentum178 that first, the ÖVP did not stick to the governmental program and changed its focus exclusively to political Islam. Second, the Documentation Center is a top-down institution and not like the DÖW (Documentation Center of Austrian Resistance), which monitors far-right extremism and is an institution that works together with civil society. Besides criticizing the notion “political Islam,” Strobl also argued that there are many other religious extremisms in Austria, first and foremost those in the government. Further, she criticized the fact that power is in the hands of patriarchic male clubs that dominate the power structures rather than in the hands of Muslims. Lastly, she argued that the anti-Muslim populism was simply a distraction strategy.

In a critical piece in Der Standard, Günther Ogris from the renowned SORA Institute argued that the ÖIF’s research report “Social Hotspots in the Context of Migration and Integration” (Soziale Brennpunkte im Kontext von Migration und Integration) is based on one-sided questions that reinforce stereotypes. He concluded his op-ed with the words, “The Integration Fund should remove the report from its homepage, apologize for misleading the public and become aware of its task. Commissioned reports should not serve to reinforce prejudices with propaganda, but to improve its own strategies.”179

In an op-ed, Der Standard journalist Gerald John stated that Minister Susanne Raab is framing Muslims as a cause of problems in her discourse, which in turn leads to seclusion, which the minister pretends to fight.180

The complaint made by a Muslim family of Palestinian origin, who wanted to purchase a house, but was initially prevented from doing so by the local council because “Islamic cultures were too different from local ones,” finally met with success. The Lower Austria’s State Administration Court refused the city council’s decree in a first instance, and the family was allowed to buy the house.181

In March 2020, the IGGÖ announced it had made an appeal at the European Court of Human Rights because the Constitutional Court had rejected its case against the public education authority which had renamed the religious confession on a pupil’s school certificate from “Islam” to “IGGÖ.”182 but it did not walk the talk.

The initial plan of the coalition program was to expand the already existing hijab ban up to the age of 14. Minister Susanne Raab said shortly after her inauguration that “girls never wear the hijab out of free will.”183

On October 1, 2020, news was published according to which 211 Turkish Muslim organizations including the ATIB (Austrian Turkish Union of Social Cooperation) and the Islamische Föderation (Islamic Federation) were controlled by the tax authority. According to the report, 40% of the associations might lose their non-profit status.184 The news was published before the associations had received any official writing from the authorities and both the ATIB185 and the Islamische Föderation186 protested against the allegations, which they saw as a form of prejudgment.187

The regional Anti-Discrimination Styria (Antidiskriminierungsstelle Steiermark), which established the Ban-Hate-Handy-App,188 documented 1,822 digital hate messages in 2019. The number nearly doubled in 2020, documenting a total of 3,215 reported cases; 962 cases were conspiracy-related cases, 665 were right-wing extremist messages, 207 were racist messages, and 144 were anti-Muslim messages.\footnote{189}

Justice Minister Alma Zadić (The Greens) received death threats on social media shortly after being nominated for her new position.\footnote{190} Critical journalists such as Olivia Stajić pointed to the fact that although the coalition partner ÖVP defended her, they would not really call out the racial, anti-Muslim, and sexist motivation of these attacks. “The chancellor and the Austrian People’s Party are missing a unique opportunity to make a clear statement condemning the anti-Muslim, xenophobic, racist, and sexist tirades against Alma Zadić. They relativize her and thus weaken cohesion in the new government and in the country as a whole, right from the start.”\footnote{191}

As the Twitter account “FPÖ Fails” has shown, many of the hate crimes were anti-Muslim. Users on Facebook posted names for Zadić like “Islam Puy,” “Next step: SHARIA” and other abusive language and death threats.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

As this report shows, Islamophobia is at the heart of the Islam policies of the government in power, primarily the Minister of Interior Karl Nehammer and the Minister of Integration Susanne Raab. They are supported by academics like Lorenzo Vidino, Susanne Schröter, and Mouhanad Khorchide, and university graduates like Heiko Heinisch and Nina Scholz. While politicians in representative positions established institutions like the Documentation Center for Political Islam and use institutions like the Austrian Integration Fund to promote their agenda of criminalizing Muslim civil society, scholars and activists write op-eds and give interviews in national media outlets to support the government policies in the public discourse.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

On February 26, 2020, the NGO SOS Mitmensch presented its annual report on anti-Muslim racism in Austrian politics with political scientists Benjamin Opratko and Kathrin Stainer-Hämmerle. Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, social activism was severely reduced. One of the most important victories against state Islamophobia was the Constitutional Court’s repeal of the ban of the hijab in elementary school in December 2020.

Oppositional politicians in the national parliament used their right to submit a questionnaire regarding the Documentation Center for Political Islam and Operation Luxor, but a substantial outcry was still absent.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

The hegemony of the anti-Muslim discourse is unbroken. The Greens were not able to tame this trend that has been in place since the new ÖVP took over power, first with the FPÖ and now in a coalition with the Greens. The pandemic and the subsequent lockdowns also handicapped people in terms of moving physically and exchanging views more freely, which also impacted anti-racist work in general. Since many anti-Muslim legislations have become part of the new coalition in power, there is still an utmost need to contest the political hegemony of Islamophobia. Since the anti-terror package aims not only to implement a new law against “terrorism,” but also wants to change the Islam Act of 2015 as well as a number of other legislations, this will have severely negative consequences on the Muslim community, which is designed to be even further under the control and surveillance of the state authorities in a discriminatory way compared to other churches and religious denominations. The IGGÖ has to reject fully any further deliberation with the current government on changing the Islam Act toward the worse. Some recommendations follow below.

- The Islam Act has to be legally contested.
- The organized anti-Muslim network has to be uncovered, especially those involved in the Documentation Center for Political Islam and the raid of November 9.
- Training on racism, especially Islamophobia, should be offered to journalists, lawyers, and police (security officials) by qualified personnel.
- Muslim civil society has to be empowered with tools to combat Islamophobia, especially in the creation of a consciousness towards the illegality of hate crimes.
- Educational institutions and stakeholders have to work towards creating an alternative narrative of Muslims in Austria which will work to dispel the widely accepted negative image of Islam.

Executive Summary

Throughout 2020, and in spite of the global COVID-19 pandemic, Islamophobia has persisted throughout Belgium. Whilst the nature of the localised lockdowns and social distancing has meant that there have been fewer reports of Islamophobic attacks on individuals when compared to previous years, there has been a continued manifestation of Islamophobic attacks on spaces and places perceived to be associated with Belgian Muslimness. For example, Belgian mosques and public spaces have been attacked in various ways, from graffiti to offensive caricatures, and, in a more extreme example, bloodied crosses and swastikas, and animal innards were left at the holiday cottage of a holidaying Muslim family in Lierneux in August 2020.

The year also saw a significant level of structural Islamophobia in Belgium. The Belgian regional ban on ritual slaughter, which affected Jewish and Muslim communities and was implemented in Flanders and Wallonia during the preceding year, was debated in the European Court of Justice in 2020 and an advisory opinion concerning its illegitimacy was issued; however, the ban persists.

Similarly, and perhaps most significant in 2020, was the ban on philosophical, political, and faith symbols that was passed under the framework of neutrality, here somewhat akin to French laïcité. The ban on supposedly non-neutral symbols would disproportionately impact Muslim women who wear the hijab and as such the ban was met with strong condemnation and protest; in July 2020, thousands assembled in Brussels to protest the ban under the hashtag #HijabisFightBack.

The globalisation of Islamophobia influencing Belgium was increasingly clear, not only in the above ban, but also in the foiled plan of five Danes to burn the Quran. The Danes were subsequently arrested and extradited by Belgian officials.

Belgian counter-Islamophobia initiatives remain strong and exemplary, apparent in the examples of the CCIB and the UNIA, which are discussed in depth in the relevant section of the report.
Synthèse

De façon similaire, et peut-être le plus significatif pendant 2020, était l’interdiction des symboles philosophiques, politiques et religieuse dans le cadre de neutralité – semblable à la laïcité Française. La prohibition sur les symboles soi-disant non-neutres toucherais les femmes Musulmanes qui portent l’hijab d’une façon disproportionnée et de ce fait l’interdiction attrait condamnation forte et manifestations; en juillet 2020 plusieurs de gens réunis pour manifester sous l’hashtag #HijabisFightBack.

La globalisation de l’islamophobie qui influence la Belgique était de plus en plus clair, pas seulement dans l’interdiction susmentionnée, mais aussi dans le plan, de cinq Danois, déjoué de bruler le Quran, qui était par la suite arrêté et extradé par les officiels Belges.

Des initiatives contre Islamophobie reste forts et exemplaires, évident dans les exemples, de CCIB et UNIA, discutés en détail dans cette section du rapport.
Country Profile

EIR 2020

Country: Kingdom of Belgium

Type of Regime: Federal parliamentary constitutional monarchy

Form of Government: Representative democratic federal bicameral parliamentary system, headed by the monarch.

Ruling Parties: Coalition government (normal in Belgian politics)

Opposition Parties: Francophone parties include Mouvement Réformateur (MR), Parti Socialiste (PS), Centre Démocrate Humaniste (CdH), Écolo, and Parti Populiste. Flemish parties include Nieuw-Vlaamse Alliantie (NVA), Christen Democratische en Vlaamse and Open Vlaamse Liberalen en Democratie, Socialistische Partij Anders, Vlaams Belang (VB), and Groen.

Last Elections: The last elections took place in May 2019 and run on a five-year cycle in line with the European Parliamentary elections. The highest-ranking parties were as follows: NVA – 25 seats, PS – 20 seats, VB – 18 seats, MR – 14 seats, and Écolo – 13 seats.

Total Population: 11.4 million

Major Languages: Flemish in Flanders (approx. 59% of population), Wallonia and Brussels are predominantly francophone. Finally, 0.7% of the total population is German-speaking and based in francophone Liège. English is also widely spoken throughout.

Official Religion: There is no official state religion in Belgium. However, Christianity, Islam, and Judaism are officially recognised, with much of the nation identifying as Roman Catholic.

Statistics on Islamophobia: The Counter Islamophobia Collective in Belgium (Collectif Contre l’Islamophobie en Belgique – CCIB/Collectief Tegen Islamofobie en België – CTIB) documents statistics annually on Islamophobia in Belgium, based on evidence derived from the Interfederal Centre for Equal Opportunities (UNIA) and direct reports.

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: Statistics are compiled by the UNIA, under seventeen of the nineteen legal bases of discrimination, including racial discrimination (presumed race, skin colour, nationality, ancestry, and ethnic origin), disability-based discrimination, philosophical/religious discrimination, sexual orientation, age, wealth, civil status, political beliefs, trade union membership, health, physical/genetic characteristics, birth, and social background.

Major Religions (% of Population): Although there is no official state census of religious affiliation in Belgium, estimates suggest a 60.7% Christian population (predominantly Roman Catholic but also including some Protestants and Orthodox Christians), 6% Muslims, and 0.4% Jewish.

Muslim Population (% of Population): 6% of the Belgian population (estimated 870,000)

Main Muslim Community Organisations: The Belgian Muslim Executive (Exécutif des Musulmans de Belgique/ Executief van de Moslims van België – EMB) serves as the official national interlocutor on Islam and Muslim communities in the country (under the official recognition of Islam), comprising representatives from the federal regions. It oversees the registration of mosques and clergy, chaplains, Muslim/ Islamic religious education teachers in state schools, ritual slaughter certificates, and announcing religious festivals among other key details in the function of Islam in Belgium.

Main NGOs Combatting Islamophobia: CCIB, UNIA, ENAR, among others.

Far-Right Parties: Flemish Interest (Vlaams Belang – VB)

Far-Right Movements: Katholiek Vlaams Hoogstudentenverbond, Nationalistische Studentenvereniging, Schild en Vrienden, and Voorpost.

Far-Right Militant Organisations: Rather than groups being directly designated as “far-right militant organisations”, far-right actions tend to be condemned.

Limitations to Islamic Practices
- Hijab Ban: No national ban, regional ban in Verviers and individual school-specific bans.
- Halal Slaughter Ban: Flanders since January 2019, Wallonia since September 2019.
- Minaret Ban: Only discussion following the Swiss calls for a ban during the early 2010s.
- Circumcision Ban: Only discussion.
- Burka Ban: A burka ban is in place since 1 June 2011. Those found wearing the burka in Belgian public spaces are subject to monetary fines of between €15 and €25, and imprisonment of up to seven days.
- Prayer Ban: There is no specific national or federal ban on prayer in Belgium. However, it is linked to employment discrimination cases.
Introduction

Islamophobia in Belgium has continued to grow during 2020. The global COVID-19 pandemic and the associated lockdowns and social distancing have given rise to an apparent evolution in the nature of Belgian Islamophobia. Unlike previous years where attacks on Muslim women dominated, this year has seen a number of attacks on places, including attacks on mosques and Muslim holidaymakers in Lierneux.

Perhaps most significantly, 2020 has seen the entrenchment of Belgian structural intersectional Islamophobia – apparent in the implementation of the allegedly neutrality-based ban on philosophical, political, and religious symbols – which would undoubtedly impact hijab-wearing Belgian Muslim women. The legislated ban sparked significant protests in Brussels.

The political, media, and internet domains continue to be significant platforms for Islamophobic discourse and even hate speech. Notwithstanding, in the aforementioned discursive fields there remain strong initiatives to call out Islamophobia and to support Belgian Muslimness. The year also brought about noteworthy practices in Belgium’s counter-Islamophobia scene including work centred on advocacy and the documentation of Islamophobia.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

As documented in previous editions of the European Islamophobia Report, physical and verbal Islamophobic attacks on people and places continued to be prevalent in 2020. The start of the year was marked by a physical Islamophobic attack on Al-Ihsan Mosque in Louvain,¹ thus highlighting the way in which Islamophobia functions via the targeting of perceived Muslim spaces.

Further attacks on space – in a location not explicitly linked to perceived Belgian Muslims – is apparent in the “FK Muslim” (sic) graffiti tags painted on a road on 31 May 2020. (Fig. 1) The incident was reported online via the Collectif Contre l’Islamophobie en Belgique/Collectief Tegen Islamofobie in België (Counter Islamophobia Collective in Belgium) and was met with online hostility as detailed in the section of this report pertaining to Islamophobia on the internet.²

Additionally, in early November 2020, Islamophobic caricatures were stuck onto a mosque in Wallonia. The caricature contains an image and text taken from the French satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo and specifically, an image of buttocks and hairy legs with the individual bending over. It is accompanied by a caricature of what the magazine claims is the Prophet Muhammed (a clear provocation given that Muslims do not depict God or the Prophets) along with the text “Et le cul de Mahomet, on a le droit?” (And the backside of Muhammed, do we have the right [to draw it]?) (Fig. 2) This use of the Charlie Hebdo caricatures in the weeks following the murder of Samuel Paty in neighbouring France, who is believed to have been killed by a student for his use of such images demonstrates the fluidity of Islamophobic ideas across national boundaries. When the francophone European, and even global, debate around the freedom of speech, or perhaps the right to offend, become so central to the national imagination, the way in which particularly sensationalised tools become employed to stoke Islamophobia within Belgian society was seemingly legitimised. The event was reported by the CCIB, as seen in Figure 2. The Islamophobic and, more generally, racist and insensitive nature of the publication, particularly vis-à-vis Belgium, is discussed further in this section of the report.

A more shocking example of a direct Islamophobic attack took place against a Belgian Muslim family holidaying in Lierneux in late August 2020. The family was, as the Belgian media states, “terrorised” by three masked men. The men attacked the Muslim family whilst they stayed in a holiday cottage by throwing the innards of slaughtered animals on the pathway of the cottage and also at the family’s car, along with bloodied crosses and swastikas. The media commentary around the event makes it clear that the Islamophobic character of this attack in undeniable; however, there exists an apparent intersection between ethnic racism and Islamophobia given the multifaceted identities of the family who was attacked. Farida, the mother of the family, speculated that the innards that had been left at the cottage may have been from a pig (and particularly within the context of the ban on ritual slaughter in the federal Belgian communities of Flanders and Wallonia) and specifically that the attack was an Islamophobic provocation. The bloodied items left by the attackers at the crime scene also point to the desecration of Christian symbols. The attackers were believed to be from the identitarian movement. In many ways, this draws parallels to the attack perpetrated in Avignon, France, on 29 October 2020, by a member of the Generation/Mouwance Identitiäire movement although the attacker here shouted “God is Great” (Allahuakbar) in Arabic. This was done presumably to be reported as a Muslim enacting terror. The attacks highlight the increased threat of violence from organised far-right Islamophobic actors.

Comparatively speaking, the level of reported Islamophobic verbal and physical attacks on individuals directly and in person has seemingly decreased compared to previous years as covered by the relevant annual “Islamophobia in Belgium: National Report”. Previous examples include Muslim women and visibly Muslim women in particular being pushed onto the tracks of the Brussels metro or having their headscarves forcibly removed from their heads.10 Given the current context of the global pandemic and the various national lockdown measures that have been imposed throughout the nation, it is likely that, similar to other citizens and inhabitants, Muslims are less likely to have been in spaces where they are likely to encounter others at close proximity and therefore face Islamophobic attacks in a face-to-face environment. As with all hate crime statistics, the reported physical and verbal Islamophobic attacks represent the tip of the iceberg in terms of the potential volume of Islamophobic attacks given the limitations of reporting biases. Nonetheless, the Statistical Report published by the CCIB in September 2020 pertaining to reported Islamophobia in the year preceding details that of the reported incidents 90% are attacks against perceived Muslim women.11

Belgium is home to the “Achbita vs G4S” case, which surrounded the question of neutralité and the wearing of the headscarf by Achbita. The case was heard in Belgium initially and was subsequently taken to the European Court in 2017. The removal of Achbita from her employment at G4S on the grounds of company neutrality was deemed to be legitimate by the European Court of Justice Attorney General Sharpston. As highlighted in previous editions of the Belgian section of the European Islamophobia Report, this European-level legal decision gives further legitimacy to the discrimination of visible gendered Muslimness in the Belgian labour force. This is compounded by the existing evidence pointing to the discrimination of candidates seeking employment with Muslim-sounding names.12 Thus, given the empirical evidence coupled with the supranational-level legal decision, it is highly likely that this environment will create limited opportunities for Muslim engagement in employment, and particularly will limit Muslim women’s opportunities for employment. Furthermore, it is difficult for both applicants and monitoring bodies to ascertain fully the extent to which candidates are rejected on the grounds of their Muslimness or on the basis of intersectional discrimination in the workplace.

At the same time, this year has been marked by several positive campaigns to reinforce the inclusion of Muslimness in the Belgian workforce. For example, the Belgian food retail company, DelHaize, runs a media campaign which includes a visibly Muslim woman on the advertisement. (Fig. 3) The text in the image boasts of the woman’s sociability. Furthermore, the recruitment campaign by DelHaize normalises the presence of visibly Muslim women both in the workforce and in society more generally. As such, the advertisement represents a positive yet simple means of countering gendered Islamophobic perceptions particularly against the background of the legal precedence in the dismissal of hijab-wearing employees.

Education

Arguably the most significant Islamophobic developments in Belgium in 2020 pertain to the educational field. In June 2020, the Belgian Constitutional Court issued a decision seeking to ban faith symbols (including political and philosophical symbols) - and, therefore, including the hijab - from higher education institutions and settings on the grounds of “neutrality”.14

The Belgian concept of neutralité – particularly as it applies in the francophone Belgian regions – has long been applied to limit visible manifestations of Muslimness by individuals in Belgian society and it has similarly long been contested in society. The ban on allegedly non-neutral symbols, and particularly its employment as a tool for the limitation of visible Muslimness and often Muslim women’s headscarves, bears strong resemblance to the debates framed around laïcité or secularism in neighbouring France. French laïcité has been argued by many to have been transformed by the state from its historical philosophical and ideological grounding in which the Church and state were separated, towards a weaponised mode of targeting Islam and Muslimness in the French nation.15 Given the centrality of laïcité within the French national imaginary, the potential space and possibility for the contestation of Islamophobic French laïcité becomes further limited. The resemblance of Belgian neutralité and French laïcité highlights the fluidity of ideas and concepts that may be employed to promote Islamophobia across national boundaries and its increasing globalisation.

The ban on so-called non-neutral symbols in francophone Belgian universities which would namely impact Muslim women who wear the hijab (NB the full-face veil or niqab is outlawed throughout Belgium since 2011 on the grounds of national security) was met with strong protest by many Belgians. Although the ban was framed as a move towards neutrality, its distinctly gendered Islamophobic implications recalls distinctly colonialist liberation narratives similar to those expressed prior to the implementation of the 2004 French Loi Stasi.16 Such colonialist narratives form a cornerstone of gendered Islamophobia both in Belgium and in the West more broadly. As Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak writes, “White men are saving brown women from brown men”.17 Here, and in the case of France, the state under the guise of neutralité or laïcité – which it incidentally contradicts – as a form of structural whiteness (thus constituting the “white men” who Spivak refers to) seeks to liberate or save Muslim women from the perceived ills of covering, thus demonstrating a clear intersection between misogyny and gendered Islamophobia in state policy. Furthermore, such legislated measures directly impact Muslim women’s education in the present and in the future.

16. The law is commonly referred to as the Loi Stasi in French discourse and pertains to the prohibition of “ostentatious faith symbols” in French schools, but ultimately led to the exclusion of Muslim girls who wore the headscarf and a comparatively smaller number of baptised Sikh boys who wore the turban. Loi du 15 mars 2004-228 encadrant, en application du principe de laïcité, le portage de signes ou de tenues manifestant une appartenance religieuse dans les écoles, collèges et lycées publics (Paris, France: Legifrance, 2004).
In response to the clear contradictions of the university-level hijab ban and its distinct gendered Islamophobic nature, on Sunday, 5 July 2020, more than a thousand protestors assembled in the afternoon in Mont des Arts, Brussels to protest the ban and particularly its implications on visibly Muslim women. The event was organised via social media channels under the hashtag #HijabisFightBack. Numerous protestors carried placards at the event which included slogans such as #HijabisFightBack, “Neutrality is not exclusion”, “Don’t touch my hijab”, “Belgium, your Islamophobia is showing”, “My head is covered, not my brain”, “Stop telling women what to do with their bodies”, “They pretend to want to free me by taking away my freedom” and references to Fatima al-Fihri, the Muslim woman who was the founder of the oldest university on record. (Fig. 4)

19. Subsequently, certain Belgian higher education institutions issued statements noting that the ban would not be enacted on their premises. For example, the Vrije Universiteit Brussel (VUB) stated, “Equality and inclusion are central to the VUB. Diversity is a fact, at our university as well. So, let it be clear that every student is welcome for us regardless of gender, origin or social status. With or without headscarf.”21 Similarly, the Katholieke Universiteit Leuven (KU Leuven) noted, “Ja, je mag een hoofddoek dragen aan onze universiteit. Als universiteit bieden we ruimte aan religieuze en levensbeschouwelijke diversiteit, en respecteren we het dragen van religieuze symbolen of kleding. Meer informatie vind je hier” (Yes, you can wear a headscarf at our university. As a university, we offer space for religious and ideological diversity, and we respect the wearing of religious symbols or clothing).22 These remarks signal that Belgian universities will continue to maintain inclusion of visibly Muslim women, notwithstanding the fact that the move at the state level still signals and legitimises gendered Islamophobia in the country.

By way of background Belgium does not have a national ban on the hijab, rather, at local level, regions and schools have the freedom to decide whether or not to allow the headscarf. For example, in Verviers, and akin to the French Loi Stasi wording, “ostentatious symbols” are prohibited in school – meaning students cannot wear the headscarf.24 Nonetheless, this debate is not restricted to Verviers and surfaces frequently particularly within the context of francophone Belgian education.

Beyond the university-level headscarf ban, notable examples of Islamophobia in education include a schoolteacher being suspended from his position as a result of having shown potentially inflammatory caricatures to his students aged between 10 and 11 in the Ecole no.11 aux Sources du Gai Savoir school in the Molenbeek district of Brussels in October 2020. It is unclear if the teacher intended to cause offence, although it might be argued that this is the overall intent of the images regardless of the teacher’s position. Following the suspension of the unnamed teacher, far-right Flemish MPs in particular came out to condemn the suspension as detailed later in the report.

This comes in the wake of the murder of Samuel Paty in neighbouring France and the global debate that it sparked surrounding the freedom of speech and the right to offend, a debate often marked by the absence of focus on the responsibilities that come with free speech. Furthermore, debates that stem from the Charlie
Hebdo caricatures also fail to problematise the character of the caricatures produced by the magazine, including, for example, the depiction of a then minister, Christiane Taubira, as an ape.25

Educational establishments in Belgium also contested growing Islamophobia in neighbouring France as was apparent in the case of the European Benelux University Islamic Studies Department that, in November 2020, launched an appeal to sue the current French President Emmanuel Macron on the grounds of his Islamophobic political discourse.26 Here, arguably Macron’s discourse not only stokes Islamophobia both in politics and on the grassroots level, but his increasingly Islamophobic discourse also signals an attempt to pander to the growing far-right electorate in France apparent in the ever-growing success of Rassemblement National headed by Marine Le Pen, ahead of the 2022 presidential electoral campaign. The date signals that not only will the rise of Islamophobia in French political discourse be long term, but that it is important to note that ideas circulate beyond geographical boundaries and, in particular, given their shared francophone nature, such political narratives have strong potential to influence neighbouring Belgium.

Under the framework of the national recognition of faith groups, including Islam, in Belgium, February 2020, saw the introduction of university-level training of Belgian imams at the Katholieke Universitat Leuven.27 The training of Muslim religious clergy here within the Belgian context reflects wider debate regarding the potential value of the educational formation of clergy within their home context. Whilst the aforementioned training is likely to bring benefit for Belgian Muslims in this context, the debate is often co-opted in wider Islamophobic and xenophobic discourse surrounding immigration and the Countering Violent Extremism (CVE) agenda. Given its instrumentalization against the presence of Muslimness in a given nation this, in turn, contributes to Islamophobia. It should be noted that the Belgian context has its own specificities - namely, around the recognition and funding of populous faith communities in the nation - which does not single out this move as unusual within the framework of faith in Belgium.

Politics

The Belgian political domain continues to see Islamophobic political discourse. As with previous years, Flemish Belgian members of parliament tend to lead in this re-

For example, following the suspension of the Molenbeek-based teacher for showing inflammatory Islamophobic images, Flemish Belgian MP Theo Francken took to Twitter to condemn the suspension as shocking. Whereas francophone Belgian Senator Georges L. Bouchez also tweeted to say that he hoped that the news of the teacher’s suspension was incorrect and continued by adding, “Freedom of speech is non-negotiable”. This reflects a broader political and global debate surrounding the rights and responsibilities attached to freedom of speech, the right to offend, and Islamophobia.

Perhaps reflective of the broader traditions of the growing political polarisation apparent in Belgium and more broadly, this year also saw a growing number of Belgian political representatives coming forward to express support and celebrate Muslim traditions and festivals. For example, Belgian Deputy Prime Minister (and former Prime Minister) Sophie Wilmès took to Twitter on 24 May 2020 to state, “I wish Muslims in Belgium, and beyond, a good festival #EidAlFitr #Ramadan”. Similarly, Belgian MP and President of the centrist party Défi tweeted to wish a “Good festival, Eid el-Fitr, to all our Muslim fellow countrymen”. Such social media-based expressions of support are often replicated by parliamentarians across the West more generally, and such tweets contribute towards normalising Muslimness in the country.

During 2020 and against the background of the global COVID-19 pandemic, as in many other nations, medical mask-wearing or face covering was mandated in Belgium. Here it is important to highlight that as of 1 June 2011, the covering of one’s face has been outlawed throughout Belgium. The ban on face coverings in Belgium follows similar and preceding face-covering bans at the federal level. Nonetheless, the ban disproportionately impacts Muslim women who wear the niqab or face veil, and much of the discourse around the ban was centred on gendered Muslimness and its visibility. This is in contrast to the remarkably similar and preceding French ban on face coverings in public which was constructed around laïcité or secularism. The Belgian niqab ban came into effect in spite of very few Belgian Muslim women wearing the niqab, with some estimates as low as 30 women throughout the country. Instead the political debate and the implementation of the legislation was seemingly more about the Islamophobic othering of gendered Muslimness in Belgium. Against this background of the legislated ban on face covering, and given that the concealment of one’s face is allegedly deemed to threaten national security alongside the distinctly gendered Islamophobic connotations of the legislated ban, the adoption of medical masks as a means to slow the spread of COVID-19 was considered by the Flemish nationalist far-right political party, Vlaams Belang, to be a move towards an alleged “Islamisation”, as flagged by the CCIB in July 2020. This is evidenced in Figure 6 which displays the alleged steps between wearing a medical mask and the full-face veil.

Additionally, on 21 September 2020, on the Vlaams Beland Brussels page the party shared images of a headscarf-wearing woman along with the caption “Après Molenbeek-Saint-Jean, voilà #Schaerbeek qui met en doute le principe de neutralité au sein de l’administration #communale. Continuons comme ça et d’ici dix ans 34. Moniteur, Lai visant à interdire le port de tout vêtement cachant totalement ou de manière principale le visage, (Brussels, Belgium: Moniteur, 2011).

Bruxelles est une région musulmane. Le Vlaams Belang dit haut et fort: NON au #communautarisme, NON à l’islamisme et surtout NON-AU #VOILE!” (After Molenbeek-Saint-Jean, here is #Schaerbeek who is putting the question of neutrality into question in the heart of #communal administration. Carry on like that and ten years from now Brussels will be a Muslim area. Vlaams Belang says loud and clear: NO to #ghettoisation, NO to Islamism and above all NO TO THE #HEADSCARF). (Fig. 7) The caption accompanying the image recalls a significant number of Islamophobic tropes – namely the idea of a Muslim demographic takeover and its embodiment in the headscarf. The caption also contains class-bound ideas in the use of the term “ghettoisation”, a flawed conflation of Muslimness with “Islamism”, and frames Flemish nationalism not in terms of the Franco-Dutch Belgian rivalry, but instead that Flanders and Belgianness are constructed in opposition to Muslimness. Not unsurprisingly, the Facebook post attracted Islamophobic hate speech from those who follow the page online including ideas around Muslims going back home.39

Media

The Belgian media continues to be a mouthpiece for Islamophobia in 2020. For example, the Belgian media reports the Islamophobic political discourse shared by Vlaams Belang and their followers. This is evident in The Brussel Times report published on

40. Ibid.
6 February 2020,\(^{41}\) in which the reporters included a screenshot of a Vlaams Belang tweet pertaining to the reported hate speech that occurred following a mass Muslim prayer in Molenbeek to commemorate the recently deceased religious expert and community leader, Rachid Haddache. Vlaams Belang posted the following in Dutch “Hallucinante beelden uit #Molenbeek. Duizenden moslims herdenken salafistische haatprediker Rachid Haddach. De straat wordt zelfs afgezet voor de massa e/h gebed. Onvoorstelbaar. Het #salafisme, een fundamentalistische islamstroming, heeft geen enkele plaats in onze maatschappij!” (Hallucinatory images #Molenbeek. Thousands of Muslims commemorate Salafi hate preacher Rachid Haddach. The street is even closed for mass prayer. Unimaginable. Salafism, a fundamentalist Islam movement, has no place in our society!) The insensitive quotes which followed the marking of a community member’s death conflated Islam with extremism and further stoked Islamophobia in the nation.

The report added that Vlaams Belang followers added comments such as calls to run over the worshippers or to throw grenades at them. Whilst this, on the one hand, platforms Islamophobic views, in this instance the report also documents the way in which a probe into hate speech has been launched following the comments, thus putting into question and calling out the party’s Islamophobic positions. Here, the media has a clear role to play in questioning and problematising Islamophobia.

Justice System

The Belgian justice system holds a dual role in the proliferation and countering of Islamophobia in the country in 2020: it acts both as a maintainer and implementer of Islamophobia, and simultaneously as a tool which may and has been employed to counter growing Islamophobia and particularly countering specific Islamophobic acts in 2020.

Most notably, the Belgian Constitutional Court passed legislation on 4 June 2020 to ban visible political, philosophical, and faith symbols,\(^{42}\) namely the hijab, from Belgian higher educational institutions. As noted previously in this report, the ban was legitimised through its framing on the grounds of neutrality, somewhat akin to French laïcité. Whilst some Belgian universities have explicitly stated that the ban will not be upheld on their campuses (see section entitled Education for further details) the legislative decision sends a clear signal regarding the acceptability of visible gendered Muslimness in Belgian society. This legislative ban has not occurred in a vacuum, but rather it follows the ongoing fixation in the nation with Belgian Muslim women’s bodies and dress in their pursuit of education. For example, as highlighted above, the francophone region of Verviers operates a ban on ostentatious faith symbols in schools and, similarly (albeit not legislated), the long skirts affair during the summer of 2015 in Brussels. These examples not only have sexist and Islamophobic implications in the initial instance, but the legalised measures also serve to limit Muslim women’s futures. Here, the justice system acts as an implementer and maintainer of gendered Islamophobia.

In 2019, the federal regions in both Flanders and Wallonia implemented a legislated ban ritual slaughter. This ban impacted the slaughter of both kosher and halal meat as per the Jewish and Islamic faiths respectively, but the legislated ban also reduced the practice of halal for example solely to slaughter, ignoring the wider basis and emphasis on animal rights within the concept of halal and kosher. The ban was often legitimised on the basis and flawed assumption that ritual slaughter is paradoxically somehow more barbaric than conventional slaughter. The debate preceding the implementation of the ban on ritual slaughter was co-opted by animal rights and far-right activists, and often presented distinctly Islamophobic and anti-Semitic undertones.

The way in which both the Jewish and Muslim communities were impacted by the ban on ritual slaughter led to joint appeals by the two faith communities and as such the ban was reheard by the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg in September 2020. The European Court of Justice’s Attorney General Gerard Hogan in a non-binding opinion issued on 10 September 2020, deemed the ban not to be legitimate as it contravened European freedom of faith.

Given that Hogan’s advisory opinion is non-binding, there is a strong possibility that the advisory opinion will not be implemented and that the ban will persist. The Belgian case and the advisory opinion issued by the European Court of Justice are pivotal given that similar bans exist in Slovenia, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden.

The Belgian justice system has also been employed to counter and penalise racist and xenophobic abuse experienced by prominent Belgian Muslims. In July 2020, Alain Binet was sentenced to 150 hours of community service for having attacked former Belgian parliamentarian, Mahinur Özdemir, online in 2015. The justice system’s response should dissuade individuals from enacting online hate speech.

Internet

The internet continues to be a mouthpiece and platform for Islamophobia in Belgium and beyond. Specific actors of online Islamophobia include far-right parties via social media channels. For example, as discussed previously in the section of this report pertaining to Islamophobia in Belgian politics, Vlaams Belang, routinely uses their social media channels to share Islamophobic posts. These social media posts typically attract further Islamophobic comments and support from their followers.

Furthermore, a report published in April 2020 by the Belgian State Security Service notes that fringe far-right groups are taking to social media to spread Islamophobic hate speech and fake news. Groups include the Kings of Flanders and the party Nation that employed narratives of scepticism around the COVID-19 virus and later the potential vaccine to stir distrust toward the state and Belgian medical professionals, and to make the false accusation that immigration and the alleged Islamisation of the country are the cause of the underfunding of the Belgian health service.

Similarly, in January 2020, a Belgian customs officer was suspended when it was discovered by the Belgian Federal Public Service Finance department that he had created a YouTube channel, which had around 1,000 followers, to promote Islamophobic and homophobic hate speech. The customs officer described homosexuality as an “abomination” and a “perversion” and he claimed that “Islam is a false religion” and that the “Quran is a forgery.” Here it becomes clear that the internet provides not only platforms for established political parties, but also individuals who are influenced by the banalisation of Islamophobia and easily and without any checks or scrutiny are afforded a platform to promote hate speech against marginalised members of society. This further contributes to the spread and normalisation of Islamophobia not only in the nation but beyond.

50. Ibid.
52. Ibid.
Additionally, the internet provides space for those who seek to challenge those who work to counter Islamophobia. Repeatedly, for example, when the CCIB reports and documents Islamophobic incidents via its social media platforms, the organisation encounters detractors who leave comments on the posts. Such examples include accusing the CCIB and other prominent Belgian anti-racist groups, such as the UNIA, as defending those who submit to an Islamist ideology, rather than Muslims more generally.53 Or, in relation to the graffiti tag incident discussed previously, one commentator stated that the Islamophobic tag was simply “art”.54 Regarding the social media posts related to the ban on headscarves at the university level, many lay people came out to praise the maintenance of neutrality, stated that Muslims should adapt to Belgian culture, and gave examples of their “good Muslim” friends who did not wear the hijab or make trouble,55 without problematising any of the above. The aforementioned examples illustrate the ways in which those who actively seek to counter Islamophobia in the virtual space readily face online Islamophobic hate speech, perhaps in an attempt to silence their work.

The observed figures that are central to Islamophobia in Belgium are diverse. Primarily, the political far right perpetuates Islamophobia in Belgium – principal examples here include Vlaams Belang as discussed in the preceding sections. Increasingly, and given the limitations on gatherings imposed by the global COVID-19 pandemic, such actors are taking to the online sphere to share their Islamophobic views.

Central to Islamophobia, or perhaps to attempted Islamophobia, in 2020 was the arrest and expulsion from Belgium of five Danish far-right activists. The five members of Stram Kurs (Hard Line), headed by Rasmus Paludun, planned to burn the Quran in the predominantly Muslim area of Brussels, Molenbeek, in early November 2020.56 The far-right group has committed similar Quran burnings elsewhere on the continent – indicating the increasing globalisation of Islamophobia. The arrest was welcomed by Belgian Secretary of State for Asylum and Immigration, Samy Mahdi, who stated, “In our society, which is already very polarised, we don’t need people who come to spread hatred … I don’t care whether they are left-wing or right-wing extremists, I care about the safety of our citizens”.57

57. Ibid.
Islamophobia in Belgium is not restricted to the far right of the political spectrum: the implementation of the ban on visible faith symbols passed under the alleged narrative of neutrality (which subsequently disproportionately impacts visibly Muslim women) required support at the political and judicial levels. Given that the far right does not dominate at these levels, we see clear evidence that Islamophobia permeates more broadly. Arguably, the implementation of the ban on headscarves at the university level in Belgium and the maintenance of the ritual slaughter ban demonstrates the banalisation of legalised Islamophobia in the country. As highlighted previously, these measures signal the legitimacy of Islamophobia in Belgium.

Similarly, as with previous years, 2020 has shown numerous cases of everyday individuals enacting Islamophobia, ranging from the attack on the Muslim family whilst they holidayed in Lierneux to the online Islamophobic hate speech enacted by members of the public and directed at the CCIB. Thus, one must highlight both the potential influence of the central figures in the Belgian Islamophobia network, and the reach and normalisation of Islamophobia beyond these principal figures.

As with previous years, the CCIB and UNIA continue to be central actors in the effective countering of Islamophobia in Belgium. This efficacy is apparent in specific examples. In September 2020, the UNIA worked with the Brussels authorities to elaborate twenty-five recommendations to combat gendered Islamophobia in the region.58 These recommendations include the need for effective and systematic monitoring of Islamophobia and gendered Islamophobia; the training of employers on issues of Islamophobia and gendered Islamophobia given the high incidence of employment-based discrimination; the need to tackle media-based Islamophobia; and a broader awareness training among wider society.59

Similarly, the UNIA works with those who have encountered Islamophobia in Belgium. For example, in March 2020, a volunteer candidate was interviewed for a position in an elderly care home, and was asked to remove her headscarf – allegedly for hygiene reasons. The candidate contacted the UNIA who intervened and the care home agreed to allow the woman to wear her headscarf.60

In sum, in spite of the global COVID-19 pandemic and the ways in which it brought about significant health risks for all, regardless of their identities, and the various lockdowns that were imposed and which universally reduced interaction outside of the home, Islamophobia continued to manifest across Belgium in its typically diverse forms, ranging from the damage of property and attacks on individuals to legislation. Particularly concerning, and not limited to Belgium, was the conflation of the COVID-19 virus and Muslimness. This was apparent in the conflation of mask-wearing in Belgium and the flawed claim of an alleged Islamisation (the threat of demographic takeover is a popular Islamophobic narrative)61 to the persistent portrayal of geographical spaces struggling with COVID-19 alongside images of visibly Muslim individuals - as seen as well in the media coverage of COVID-19 in Leicester in the UK. These examples demonstrate that in Belgium and across Europe not even a global pandemic will lessen the incidences of Islamophobia, but that rather, as with other negative phenomena, Islamophobia is conflated with Muslimness.

In terms of recommendations at the political level there is continued need for political discourse not to constitute or contribute to Islamophobia in Belgium. As this national report in the European Islamophobia Report illustrates, there is a distinct presence of far-right actors that fuel Islamophobia in the nation. The latter have significant influence on the political narrative and the passing of legal bills which disproportionally limit Muslimness in Belgium. Similarly, Belgium is home to remarkable levels of Muslim political participation and representation62 and a number of MPs who celebrate Belgian diversity. Such Muslims and allies are in a position of power to challenge and call out Islamophobia in the Belgian political sphere.

At the NGO level, Belgium is home to exemplary practice as discussed both in terms of detailed documentation, reporting and analysis of Islamophobia as evidence by the CCIB, and in terms of advocacy as evidenced by the UNIA. The documentation of Islamophobia is crucial in demonstrating the scale and severity of Islamophobia in the nation. As such, the annual European Islamophobia Report plays a key role on the continental level. The advocacy work carried out by the UNIA in 2020 and prior occurs both with individuals who have directly experienced prejudice and on a wider level via engagement at the regional level as evidenced in its collaborative work with the Brussels authorities on their 25 recommendations to combat gendered Islamophobia. Such work recognises the significant impact of Islamophobia on women and as such is a noteworthy example of best practice in countering gendered Islamophobia.

Executive Summary

Anti-Muslim bigotry and negative trends towards Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina were evident mainly in the educational, political, and media sectors. As in previous years, the main generators of Islamophobic discourse and anti-Muslim bigotry are the Bosnian Serb politicians, media, and academic circles. The year 2020 saw a decrease in Islamophobia and anti-Muslim attacks compared to 2019. The main reason for this is the COVID-19 pandemic, and the nationwide lockdown imposed by authorities. This year marked the 25th anniversary of the Srebrenica genocide which was highlighted by the continuation of the denial of the genocide and war crimes by the Serb authorities. The local and regional media contributed to anti-Muslim bigotry with reports about terrorist threats and radical ideology, connecting it with the Bosniak political and religious establishment. Lastly, 2020 saw a decrease in the physical and verbal attacks on mosques and imams, mostly in the Bosnian-Herzegovinian entity Republika Srpska but also in Croat-majority areas.

Introduction

Bosnia and Herzegovina is a specific case of Islamophobia. Anti-Muslim bigotry has been present in Bosnia and Herzegovina for a long time. This Islamophobia reached the highest peaks with mass atrocities including genocide while Islamophobia was especially present during the Bosnian War (1992-1995). Although anti-Muslim bigotry has deep roots, the first contemporary Islamophobic statements appeared in the late 1980s and were made by scholars, Orientalists, and self-proclaimed Islam experts at the University of Belgrade. Slavic Muslims were represented as traitors of Orthodox Christianity, people with weak genes who converted to Islam. This is an interesting case of Islamophobia where hatred is aimed mainly at Slavic Muslims. After the Serbian aggression and genocide of 1992-95, Islamophobia has been present in the country and in the region. Islamophobia is manifested through political statements, in the media, and in physical attacks. Most of the attacks are aimed at Bosniak returnees in Republika Srpska and in Croat-majority areas. The largest concentration of Bosniaks is in the federation where there are almost no attacks other than occasional Islamophobic statements or writings. Research for this report was based on available reports, media analysis, and interviews with important stakeholders. People and institutions were contacted in order to gain relevant information on different topics that included the media, justice, education, etc.

It is generally accepted that Islam arrived in Bosnia with the Ottoman Empire in the fifteenth century. Today, Bosnian Muslims are overwhelmingly Sunnis. Bosnian Muslims (Bosniaks) are an indigenous Slavic ethnic group. More than 55 years of communism (1945-1990) in Yugoslavia kept religion in the dark. However, after Yugoslav President Josip Broz Tito's death in 1980, a rise of Serb nationalism first incited anti-Albanian and later anti-Muslim rhetoric. Centuries-old ideas of establishing a homogenous greater Serbian state were revived by the Yugoslav regime under Slobodan Milošević. During the period of 1992-95, an international armed conflict and genocide (the aim of establishing a Greater Serbia and Greater Croatia meant dividing Bosnia and Herzegovina and getting rid of its Muslim population) caused the deaths of at least 100,000 people, 30,000 enforced disappearances, and the rape of 30,000 women and girls. The vast majority of the victims were Bosniaks whose remains were buried in hundreds of hidden mass graves throughout the country. In addition to this, an estimated 600 mosques and a variety of Islamic religious objects were deliberately destroyed by the Bosnian Serb Army and the Croatian Defence Council. A decade of communism followed by genocidal massacres of the Bosniak population resulted in today's situation where interreligious understanding and tolerance are fragile and complex. The 1995 Dayton Peace Agreement brought an end to the war entrenching the results of genocide, and cementing the divide in the country.
When it comes to the population of Muslims in B&H, according to the census conducted in 2013, 50.11% (1,769,592) of inhabitants declared themselves as Bosniaks (out of a total of 3,531,159). A slightly larger percentage (50.70%) stated that their religion is Islam. Since, in the case of all three constituent ethnic communities in Bosnia, the ethnic and religious identities overlap to a large extent, this last figure is usually taken as indicative of the number of adherents to Islam. Due to war-related death, expulsion, and internal and external migration in the 1992-1995 aggression against B&H, the numbers and demographic distribution of ethnic groups have significantly changed.

Bosnia and Herzegovina is a secular state with no state religion. In today’s post-war B&H, the increased presence of religion in the public arena is evident. Some welcome the religious revival as a healthy assertion of identity after the decades-long de-Islamization process that occurred during the communist period, while others see it as a rising threat to the secular and politically fragile state.

Annex 1 of the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina includes 15 main documents on human rights. The constitution states that the rights and freedoms set forth in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and its Protocols shall apply directly to Bosnia and Herzegovina. A special law providing for the freedom of religion and religious non-discrimination, as well as the legal status of churches and religious communities was adopted in 2004. This is the Law on Freedom of Religion and the Legal Position of Churches and Religious Communities in Bosnia and Herzegovina. According to this law, everyone has the right of freedom of religion or belief, including the freedom to profess, or not profess, a religion publicly. Along with this, the Law on Prohibition of Discrimination was also adopted in 2009. According to this law, discrimination on the grounds of religion and belief consists of any differential treatment, including any type of exclusion, limitation or preference based on real or assumed features towards any person or group of persons on grounds of religion or belief, and every other circumstance with a purpose or a consequence that inhibits or endangers recognition, enjoyment or realization of rights and freedoms in all areas of public life (Article 2.1).

Some of the main events that sparked Islamophobic rhetoric in Bosnia and Herzegovina were related to political instability and the so-called migrant crisis. The year 2020 saw a slight decline in anti-Bosnian rhetoric from Croatia and Serbia. Bosnia and Herzegovina is usually portrayed by their institutions as a failed state which is a safe haven for terrorists.

The rising so-called migrant crisis initially had not affected Bosnia and Herzegovina. Since Serbia and Hungary closed their borders, the migrants found their way through Bosnia and Herzegovina. In most cases, Serbian authorities encouraged the refugees to go to Bosnia and Herzegovina with the aim of easing the Serbian migrant issue. On the other hand, the migrants whom the Croatian police capture are sent back over the border to Bosnia and Herzegovina. This influx of migrants was one of the main causes of Islamophobia and conspiracy theories pushed by the Bosnian Serb politicians and media.

Similarly to 2019, Islamophobic rhetoric by political figures and media is on the rise. In relation to physical attacks, 2020 was a year in which attacks were slightly lower in number than in 2019 due to the Covid-19 pandemic.

The following incidents were collected through media reports, direct reporting to the commission, and personal contacts. The Commission for the Freedom of Religion and the Interreligious Council of B&H also published a report on the monitoring and the responses to attacks on religious buildings and other holy sites in B&H. When this report was being written, the data for 2020 had not yet been published.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks
On January 13, unknown perpetrators shattered the window of the Čaršijska Mosque and further damaged the facade of the building in multiple places. The opening of the mosque was scheduled for the summer. This is not the first time the mosque was vandalized.¹ (Fig. 1) themselves in Chetnik attire. This kind of glorification of war criminals is worrying for Bosniak children who also attend this school.³ (Fig. 2)

On February 15, in Mostar, slogans such as “Gazi Balije”, “Ustase Mostar”, and “Balije u provalije”⁶ appeared at the Partisan Memorial Cemetery. These offensive fascist slogans were placed on the building the night before anti-fascist visitors gathered to celebrate the liberation of Mostar from fascism in World War II.⁷ (Fig. 3)

On February 19, in Prijedor, more than 350 people gathered for a celebration of a movie about Draža Mihailović. The event was organized by the party Ujedinjena Srpska (United Srpska) of Nenad Stevandić. Many attendees wore Chetniks attire and carried photographs of génocidaires Ratko Mladić and Draža Mihailović.9 (Fig. 4)

On February 20, in Srebrenica, a group of Serb students from elementary school attacked a girl, F.S., for wearing a hijab. The mother of the girl said her daughter was first bullied for wearing a hijab in school. The bullying continued on her way home where she was stopped and surrounded by ten students, who further bullied her, intimidated her, and asked for her hijab. According to Preporod newspaper, the students who bullied the Bosniak Muslim girl are the same students who glorified Chetniks a month earlier.11

On July 11, in Bratunac, on the 25th anniversary of the Srebrenica genocide, a local Serb pro-Russian NGO celebrated that day as the “Day of Liberating Srebrenica.” Members of the Eastern Alternative of Republic of Srpska celebrated July 11 by glorifying Ratko Mladić as a hero who saved Serbs. His face can be found on posters placed in Srebrenica, openly glorifying the genocide that occurred there.12 (Fig. 5)

On July 13, in Malešić, the Bosniak returnee Sadet Islamović was verbally attacked by one of the sons of Dušan Spasojević Brane, known as a fugitive suspect for war crimes committed against the Jusić residents of Malešić in 1992. Sadet Islamović is a witness for these crimes before the Court of BiH.14

On July 18, Srdjan Mazalica, a member of parliament in the Bosnian Serb entity in Bosnia and Herzegovina, shared his thoughts on social media about Serbs being a superior people in the Balkans. Mazalica tweeted that “Albanians should be accepted as equal human beings,” however according to his autosomal DNA calculations, there is a “genetic distance between different ethnic groups.” 15

On July 30, Bosnian Serb and member of parliament Nebojša Vukanović shared a video showing citizens of Sarajevo allegedly going to Montenegro for organized voting. From the video it can be seen that people from the bus are called out as “Turks.”16

On October 11, unknown perpetrators stoned the windows of Atik Mosque in Bijeljina. The windows of the adjacent building were also shattered. The mayor of Bijeljina, Mićo Mićić, condemned this criminal act. The Islamic Community of Bosnia and Herzegovina asked for a complete investigation from police and the prosecution.17 (Fig. 6)

Employment

In 2020, there were no registered cases of work-related discrimination. However, a worrying fact is that the number of Bosniaks living and working in Republika Srpska

---

18. Ibid.,
ISLAMOPHOBIA IN BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

is decreasing. For example, in Republika Srpska institutions, out of a total of 5,066 employees, only 43 are Bosniaks.\textsuperscript{19} This trend of Bosniaks leaving Republika Srpska is the result of the perpetually uncomfortable and discriminatory atmosphere against Bosniak employees.

Education

The year 2020 saw a continuity in denying Bosniak returnees the right to learn the Bosnian language in Republika Srpska. This is a serious violation of Bosniak children’s constitutional right to be taught as a “national group” in schools in the Serb-majority entity. As a result of this discrimination, in 2016, several Bosniak returnee communities refused to enroll their children in school. As a result, the Islamic Community provided temporary, improvised schools where children are taught according to the national B&H curriculum and teachers are brought in from the Federation B&H.

Politics

In 2020, there were no major changes in the standard rhetoric from local and regional political actors who used Islamophobic rhetoric to undermine Bosnia and Herzegovina. The two main events that contributed to this trend were the 25\textsuperscript{th} anniversary of the Srebrenica genocide and the local elections held in November 2020. The Bosnian Serb authorities announced in 2019 the formation of two “truth commissions” which would investigate the suffering of Serbs in Srebrenica and Sarajevo.\textsuperscript{20} On the other hand, certain Bosnian Serb political parties used nationalistic rhetoric in order to mobilize for elections. For example, \textit{Ujedinjenja Srpska} (US) aired a promotional video which portrayed Bosniaks, Albanians, and Croats in a defamatory manner.\textsuperscript{21} The video showed a US party delegate kicking out three enemies of Republika Srpska from a café: a Croat, an Albanian, and a Bosniak. Media

The anti-Bosnian sentiment in the media was usually followed by Islamophobic rhetoric. The statements made in the media usually associated B&H, Bosniak politicians, or former army officers with radical extremism. Such statements were made by a group of already well-known self-proclaimed experts. Two main events which raised Islamophobic rhetoric in 2020 were the so-called migrant crisis and the 2020 local elections. Bosnian Serb leader Milorad Dodik stated that the Bosnian Serb entity should be “sterilized” of migrants. In addition, he also stated that there is a threat of “Islamic terrorism” in Bosnia and Herzegovina. He said, “Islamic terrorism has a link in BiH with what is called the ‘Islamic State.’ Some families of those Islamic jihadists. BiH is not threatened by any external aggression, but it faces a serious challenge from terrorism.” The threat of an “internal conflict” and its links to terrorism was also the subject of an interview conducted by a Bosnian Serb media outlet with a German “terrorism expert.” The RS authorities represent themselves as the only institution which deals properly with terrorism. Furthermore, Bosnian Serb media published articles in coordination about a “wahabbi” plan to assassinate Serb political leaders, placing the blame on Bosniak returnees in Janja near Bijeljina.
Justice System

Hate crime as a specific crime is motivated by intolerance towards certain groups in society. Some of the several criminal codes in B&H contain limited provisions that allow more severe punishment to be imposed for crimes committed with a motivation of bias. However, the use of these provisions is inconsistent and relatively rare. For example, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (FB&H) and the Brčko District Criminal Codes include aggravated forms of some criminal acts, such as murder, rape, or causing grievous bodily injury when committed with a motivation of bias. The FB&H Criminal Code also includes an aggravated form of malicious mischief. Many laws on peace and public order at the cantonal level also include minor offences, punishable with a fine, which encompass insulting behavior based on national, racial, or religious grounds. The FB&H, Republika Srpska, and Brčko District Criminal Codes also include provisions on incitement to national, racial, or religious hatred, discord, or hostility. According to the statistics for hate crimes of the OSCE (Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe), hate crimes in B&H often target returnee communities (who are often isolated and vulnerable), and religious and sacred objects (mosques, churches, and graveyards), as well as private property belonging to returnees or members of minority communities. The OSCE B&H also records hate crimes through the Hate Monitor. More than 85% of all hate crimes registered through the Hate Monitor target ethnicity/religion. Unfortunately, the statistics are not segregated by religion. When it comes to hate speech regulations, the FB&H and Republika Srpska laws do not specifically proscribe hate speech, but prohibit acts that cause ethnic, racial, or religious hatred. Nevertheless, use of incendiary language (in the media, by politicians, and others) usually goes unpunished.

Overall, hate crimes in Bosnia and Herzegovina are underreported and rarely prosecuted. In 2020, there were no known cases related to anti-Muslim hate crimes.

Internet

Social media remain the main source of anti-Muslim bigotry and Islamophobic rhetoric online. Several Facebook pages, mainly representing Serb nationalistic groups such as Srbska Čast, Zavetnici, Vojaka Republike Srpske/Srbije, and Otačstvo published articles which spread fear of Bosniaks and included genocide denial. These social media pages remain the same as in previous years. Although there are initiatives to combat hate speech especially during election years, state institutions do not survey these sites.

The central figures in spreading Islamophobia in B&H can be divided into three categories. First, the academic and semi-academic circles in Serbia and Republika Srpska, most notably Serbian “experts” on security, terrorism, and Islam, such as Pre-drag Ceranić, Miroljub Jevtić, Dževad Galijašević, and Darko Trifunović. Second, several high-ranking officials in the Serb Orthodox Church such as Bishops Amfilohije and Patriarch Irinej. The third category is politicians and include local Bosnian Serbs and Bosnian Croats, as well as Croatian and Serbian politicians such as Milorad Dodik and Mario Karamatić. In the majority of cases, these are elected MPs in the parliamentary assemblies. These political subjects give statements which are anti-Muslim and Islamophobic aimed at Bosniak Muslims, and their political and religious establishments.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The Commission on Freedom of Religion (Komisija za slobodu vjere) is a commission of the Islamic Community in Bosnia and Herzegovina which is active in helping secure religious freedoms and battling Islamophobia. Members of the commission took an active role in monitoring cases of violation of religious freedoms and have provided legal advice to several appellants. However, due to COVID-19 pandemic, the activities of the commission were limited.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

In 2020, the number of Islamophobic attacks on people and property was slightly lower than in 2019. Similarly to 2019, there were local and regional anti-Bosniak and anti-Muslim activities and rhetoric, especially due to the protests and elections in Montenegro. Overall, in 2020, there was a much milder anti-Muslim atmosphere as a result of the pandemic.

Considering the state of Islamophobia in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the following policy recommendations to combat Islamophobia effectively can be made:

- Cooperation between governments (state level, entity level, and district Brčko level), the Islamic Community, and NGOs in fighting discrimination against Muslims should be fostered.
- Public awareness of human rights and freedom of religion and belief should be raised by NGOs, media, etc. The methods of documenting the cases of violation of the rights of Muslims should be enhanced by the Islamic Community, NGOs, the police, and the judiciary.
- Awareness of hate crimes against Muslims, and their proper registration and prosecution should be raised by the Islamic Community, NGOs, the police, and the judiciary.
- Awareness of hate speech (online and offline) by media, politicians, etc. should be raised.
• Awareness of Islamic practice (prayer, jumaah, and the headscarf) and available ways to accommodate this in education and employment should be raised. Regulations should be adjusted accordingly.
• Laws that stipulate that public officers or officials “shall refrain from public manifestation of their religious beliefs” (Zakon o policijskim službenicima Bosne i Hercegovine), which discriminate against Muslim employees in fasting, taking a break for daily prayers, or wearing the headscarf, should be amended. The most flagrant cases should be referred to the HJPC (High Judicial and Prosecutorial Council).
• Awareness among citizens and NGOs about reporting offensive media language to the Press Council in B&H and the Communications Regulatory Agency should be raised.
• Awareness among citizens and NGOs about filing complaints related to human rights violations to the B&H Ombudsman’s office, the Ministry for Human Rights and Refugees, and in regular courts should be raised.
• Commitment to countering violent extremism, but not at the expense of freedom of religion and not solely focusing on Islam or Muslims, should be developed.

Executive Summary

In 2020, Bulgaria maintained the downward trend of the last few years in the number of Islamophobic attacks on Muslim individuals, sacred places, and administrative institutions. On the other hand, representatives of the Bulgarian political class and TV presenters used their airtime, Facebook profiles, and even the podium of the European Parliament, to articulate hate speech against the Prophet Muhammad and Muslims, as well as its contemporary representatives, in the face of the refugee flow from the Middle East, the local Muslim communities, and, last but not least, Turkey, labelling all as threats to the Old Continent’s values and security.

In July, masked officers from the Bulgarian national security and anti-organised crime agencies, SANS and GDCOP, detained a 21-year-old national wrestling champion accused of “participation in terrorist actions” in Syria, where as a teenager he spent some time with his father. The entire evidence consists of photos taken years ago wherein, as a boy, he is seen holding a weapon in his hand. He shared these photos on social media to impress his peers. On the other hand, the Bulgarian prosecution continues to be ineffective against perpetrators of tens of alleged Islamophobic attacks committed in the last two decades and does not impose any sanctions on anti-Muslim hate speech.

This school year, the Bulgarian education system continued to reproduce the image of the country’s (collectively imagined) historical enemy: Ottomans enslaving Christian Bulgarians and forcibly converting them to Islam. In the meantime, hundreds of stickers with caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad appeared in public places in the second largest Bulgarian city, Plovdiv. In November, the Chief Mufti’s Office drew public attention to the case of 19 Muslims who died in Bulgarian hospitals of COVID-19 and were buried in coffins with Christian symbols.
Резюме
През 2020 г. в България се запази тенденцията от последните няколко години за намаляване броя на продиктуваните от ислямофобия нападения върху физически лица и сакрални за мюсюлманите места и административни учреждения. За сметка на това, представители на българската политическа класа и водещи на телевизионни предавания, използваха предоставения им ефир, Facebook профилите си, включително и катедрата на Европейския парламент, за да артикулират слово на омразата, насочено както срещу пророк Мохамед и уммата, така и по отношение на заплашващите според тях европейските ценности и сигурност нейни съвременни представители, в лицето на емигрантския поток от Близкия изток, местните мюсюлмански общности и не на последно място – Турция.

В началото на месец юли спец-служби на двете основни служби за сигурност в страната – ДАНС и ГДБОП, задържаха при показна акция 21-годишен републикански шампион по борба за участие в терористични акции в Сирия, където той като тийнейджър е бил на гости на баща си. Целият доказателствен материал се състои от правени преди години снимки с оръжие в ръка на момчето, които той е споделил в социалните мрежи, за да впечатли връзките си. За сметка на това българската прокуратура продължава да е неефективна по отношение на извършителите на десетки несъмнени ислямофобски атаки от последните две десетилетия, и да не санкционира анти-мюсюлманското слово на омразата.

И през тази учебна година българската образователна система продължи да репродуцира образа на историческия враг в лицето на мюсюлманите; Стотици стикери с карикатури на пророка Мохамед се появиха на обществени места във втория по големина български град – Пловдив, а Главно мюфтийство алармира за погребани в ковчези с християнски символи починали с дианоза Ковид 19 мюсюлмани.

Introduction

Bulgaria is home to the largest indigenous Muslim minority within the boundaries of the European Union. Despite the continuing rise of Islamophobic views with nationalist and xenophobic overtones supported even by high-ranking officials, both Bulgaria’s historical Muslim population (Turks, Pomaks, and Roma), and the recently formed, relatively small Arab Muslim community, did not face major conflicts with Bulgaria’s non-Muslim majority. Nevertheless, in 2020, there were several cases in which Muslims and Islamic symbols were subjected to various forms of violation. These included biased representations of their religious identity in the media, the arrest and prosecution of Muslims, and, to a lesser degree, vandal attacks on places of worship. All these generated unease and a loss of confidence in public institutions among the representatives of the Muslim community.

After the parliamentary elections in 2017, the extreme nationalist parties known for their anti-Muslim positions (namely the National Front for the Salvation of Bulgaria [NFSB], Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organisation [IMRO], and Ataka) formed the United Patriots alliance and became coalition partners with the leading centre-right party Citizens for the European Development of Bulgaria (GERB). The United Patriots entered politics through the use of hate speech and aggressive stances towards vulnerable groups, such as refugees from the Middle East, ethnic Roma, and Turks belonging to local Muslim communities. Accordingly, Islamophobic hate speech not only remained a common phenomenon in the Bulgarian political and media landscape, but it also found propagators among representatives of the judiciary and the educational system.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

There is a tendency in recent years towards a decrease in the number of physical attacks against representatives of the Muslim community and Muslim shrines. Nevertheless, anti-Muslim verbal assaults undertaken even by high-level officials have become commonplace. Given the fact that this type of verbal discourse remains unsanctioned, and thus tolerated by the judiciary, this phenomenon comes as no surprise.

In late October, students from the Medical University in the second-biggest Bulgarian city, Plovdiv, noticed stickers with blasphemous cartoons showing a copulation between a man and a pig, with the names of Allah and the Prophet Muhammad.

printed in Arabic above the figures. The stickers were placed on information boards of the Rowing Canal (Fig. 1), on tree trunks in the vicinity of the students’ dormitories, bus stops, and in various other public places in the city. The Plovdiv Regional Muftiate was notified about the stickers and, in turn, it informed the Prosecutor’s Office. The local mufti Taner Veli commented on the case on the official website of the Bulgarian Grand Muftiate with the following words: “Such irresponsible and uncere-emonious acts are directed against the fundamental principles and values of Islam. Through the prism of democracy, this is not a right to free expression, but a disregard for human rights.”

Similar Islamophobic stickers were noticed in early January (2020) on some of the light posts of Dondukov Garden alongside other stickers with vulgar and racist language such as “Ngrs not wkm” and ugly allusions related to migrants and people of colour. The stickers were placed next to promotional material for the White Front (Бял Фронт), a nationalist organisation with a clear anti-migrant orientation.

On some of the images the slogan “Spisarevski Division-Together for a Bulgarian Future” (Дивизия Списаревски-Заедно за българско бъдеще) can be seen. Captain Dimitar Spisarevski (1916-1943) was a Bulgarian fighter pilot known for taking down an American bomber by voluntarily crashing into it during the bombing of Sofia during World War II. He is one of the historical figures favoured by marginalised nationalist groups because of his alleged affiliation to Nazi Germany, which at the time was an ally of the Bulgarian state.

On 27 August 2020, Zdravko B. Spasov, a professional photographer specialised in “graffiti hunting”, published a sticker in his online Graffiti de Пловдивъ City (Graffiti of Plovdiv City) magazine with the caption “Batak: it was terrifying, but I was not afraid”. (Fig. 3) The sticker, which was photographed near the Freight Station in Plovdiv, portrays an imaginary scene from the so-called Batak Massacre: a controversial historical event dating back to 1876 which has been used widely for more than a century in various educational and patriotic contexts to incite anti-Turkish and Islamophobic reactions within the Bulgarian society. In 2007, Professor Ulf Brunnbauer, chair of Southeast and East European history at the University of Regensburg, collaborated with doctoral student Martina Baleva on a conference titled “Batak as a Place of Bulgarian Memory”. This was part of a larger project at the Free University of Berlin called “Demonising Islam: Past and Present Anti-Islamic Stereotypes in Bulgaria Exemplified by the Myth of the Batak Massacre”. Both scholars, who tried to reevaluate historical sources dedicated to the tragedy in Batak, were severely attacked by Bulgarian politicians (including then Bulgarian president Georgi Parvanov), representatives of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, and several media organs. Bulgarian media outlets raged about the “denial of the Batak Massacre” and the “criminal mockery” of such a hallowed event in Bulgaria’s national history. Bulgarian President Georgi Parvanov declared that the project was a “terrible provocation against our national history” and that the authors were attempting to rewrite history on “delicate historical topics” which is “not only deeply unacceptable but will also met the repudiation of the whole Bulgarian society.” The Sofia daily Monitor (Monitor) erroneously reported that the researchers had been paid a “five-digit Euro amount” by two Turkish foundations.8

The website mentioned at the bottom of the sticker, patriotbg.com, surprisingly does not belong to a nationalist organization, but is an online shop selling sweat-shirts and T-shirts with various inscriptions (such as “Freedom or Death”) and stamps including the one seen on the sticker in Figure 3. (Fig. 4)

Both the swastika and the Celtic cross have been adopted by local nationalists and hooligans because of their relation to Nazi ideology. (Fig. 6)

Employment

The main law in Bulgaria banning discrimination based on race, ethnicity, belief, and religion is the Protection against Discrimination Act (PADA).14 The organ established under PADA as an independent collegiate semi-judicial authority with adjudicating powers exercising control over its implementation is the Commission for Protection against Discrimination (CPAD). It is worth mentioning that two of its nine current members, Baki Hyuseinov and Sabrie Sapundzhieva, are Muslims. For 2020, there was no data issued by the CPAD or any other state equality body concerning discrimination cases in the Bulgarian job market based on being Muslim. As a matter of fact, the last annual report by the CPAD was issued for the year 2019. Consequently, official data concerning cases that occurred in 2020 is expected in the next annual report.

Discrimination based on belief and religion is hard to prove, which maybe explains why the majority of Muslims in Bulgaria do not expect their rights to be defended and restrain from reporting them.

Education

The roots of the Islamophobic approach are deeply implanted in the history and literature-related subjects taught in Bulgarian schools. Despite the total revision of all school curricula after the end of the Communist era (1944-1989), history textbooks regarding the Ottoman period still preserve most of their Islamophobic characteristics. In the newest textbooks on the subject “History and Civilizations” for the 6th and 10th grades approved by the Ministry of Education in 2019, the notorious myth about the compulsory individual and mass conversions of Orthodox Christians to Islam is reconfirmed. One of the crucial issues triggering the absolute negation of the Ottoman legacy is the fact that most Bulgarian politicians have never accepted the otherwise obvious fact that for almost five centuries the Bulgarian lands were a significant part of a multiethnic and multicultural texture, and that Bulgarians, as subjects of the Ottoman state, more or less actively contributed to the formation of its common cultural environment. The students are introduced only to the nameless figures of the sultan, the janissaries, the Muslim fanatics, etc., acting along a continuum, spread over the whole Bulgarian territory for centuries-long periods. This fact results in establishing the mindset in students of a trivial, collective image of Muslims as uncivilised conquerors, unjust rulers, and bloodthirsty oppressors. Subsequently, the historical vision of grinning janissaries armed with yataghans, and tax collectors forcing Christian families to devshirme is used as a founding milestone of Islamophobia in present-time Bulgaria.

A recent large-scale PISA (Programme for International Student Assessment)\(^1\) survey conducted by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), the largest and most detailed international review evaluating students, their teachers, and educational systems, presented in Singapore on 22 October 2020, shows that 15-year-old Bulgarian students are among the most intolerant regarding other ethnicities and cultures. And this is not a “Balkan phenomenon”, as students in countries such as Turkey, Northern Macedonia, Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo, and Romania are at the opposite pole, i.e. they are much more tolerant.\(^2\)

Politics

On 22 October 2020, Angel Dzhambazki, a member of the European Parliament and vice-chairman of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organisation, made the following statement in front of his amazed colleagues in Brussels: “Hundreds, perhaps thousands of ISIS militants entered Europe during the greatest immigration pressure. Today, they live here and are waiting for the moment when your extreme Marxism and liberal Bolshevism will lead to the collapse of the European nation-states and they will see in this collapse a chance to establish their so-called caliphate.” (Fig. 7)

Dzhambazki, who has earned a reputation in Bulgaria for his outrageous behaviour (getting caught for driving while drunk and attempting to board a plane to Brussels carrying a handgun), is notorious for his numerous public statements against Roma and Muslims. In the first days of May 2020, Dzhambazki publicly called for Roma neighbourhoods (both Muslim and non-Muslim) to be closed during the COVID-19 pandemic because “Gypsies have a very low health culture”, “have no personal hygiene”, and “are engaged in begging, theft, and prostitution”. On the basis of Dzhambazki’s proposed preventive measures against the spread of COVID-19, mayors in Bulgaria began closing Romani ghettos and set up checkpoints at their entrances. This measure selectively restricted freedom of movement on the basis of ethnicity and created a dangerous precedent. Towns with significant Romani populations like Kazanlak, Nova Zagora, Roman, and Sliven closed off the quarters inhabited by Roma and in some cases built temporary walls around them. Such extreme measures were defended by allegations that Romani people do not adhere to the emergency ban on assembly. Bulgarian Interior Minister Mladen Marinov pointed out that the government, if needed, will not hesitate to take even harsher measures against Romani residents. In association with Fakulteta, the biggest Romani neighbourhood in Sofia, he alleged that “using coercive means is justified in this case, as we are obliged to protect the rest of the population.”

As a matter of fact, representatives from all levels of the IMRO, Ataka, NFSB, and Vazrazhdane parties exercise anti-Muslim discourse as a major tool of campaigning for votes from voters with nationalist inclinations.

Media

The champion in the category “Islamophobic media” in Bulgaria for 2020 is the television channel Skat TV. This comes as no surprise since this usual suspect is owned by the far-right party NFSB. The list of cases in which anti-Muslim discourse was used on different programmes throughout the year is extremely long. We will confine ourselves to mentioning only a couple of striking examples. On 23 January 2020, the presenter of the TV programme with the meaningful title “Unveiling”, Nikolay Pankov, chose the following provocative theme: “The Muftis Proceed with the Case about Kurshum Mosque: A Green Islamist Dictate after Davos”. He suggested that the judiciary tolerated the Chief Muftiate’s struggle to restore waqf properties confiscated by the state during the Communist era. The comments of the host and his guest, Miroslav Popov, were full of dangerous speculations directed at the Muslim Denomination (Grand Mufti’s Office). Similar allegations could be heard in another programme, held on 20 February 2020, in the same series titled “Bulgarian Themis Adopted Sharia on the Eve of the Hanging of the Apostle”.

25. Themis, an ancient Greek Titaness, is a personification of divine order and law. Depiction of her wearing a blindfold and Scales of Justice is adopted as a major symbol of the Bulgarian judiciary.
On 20 January, Liubomir Zhelev from Skat TV, hosting the weekly edition of his program “On the Bosphorus” under the title “The Deep Turkish State: Sharia, Dirty Money, Weapons, Military Intervention”, demonstrated his hostility towards Bulgarian and Turkish Muslim leaders and high officials with blatant, unmasked arrogance. Zhelev called Ali Erbaş, head of the Turkish Diyanet, the “first friend of the first Muslim Brother from the Turkish Grand Mufti’s Office at Bratia Miladinovi Street”. The latter is actually the address of the Bulgarian Grand Muftiate in Sofia - the TV speaker was thus claiming that the Bulgarian Muftiate is controlled by the Turkish Directorate of Religious Affairs (Diyanet).

Justice System

On 1 July 2020, masked officers of the Bulgarian national security and anti-organised crime agencies burst into an apartment in the port city of Burgas, where Anelia Petrova and her son, Mohammed Abdulqader, were staying. They confiscated all mobile phones and laptops and took all inhabitants - Petrova, her son, her sister, and her family - into custody. Everyone was later released, except 21-year-old Abdulqader who was arrested on terrorism charges. The Specialised Prosecutor’s Office has said Abdulqader, a Bulgarian citizen born to a Bulgarian mother and Syrian father, had participated in “terrorist activities” in Syria. As evidence, the prosecution has pointed to a few photos from Syria which Abdulqader had posted on social media and his father’s membership in the armed group Sultan Murad Division in Syria. Apropos, the group was part of the Free Syrian Army supported by the Friends of Syria, an international coalition, which Bulgaria was part of. Abdulqader’s family claimed he was never involved in the fighting. He had a promising career as a wrestler, having won Bulgaria’s youth national championship three times.

Abdulqader is the first person to be tried in Bulgaria for “terrorist activity abroad” under Law 108A of the Bulgarian Criminal Code. According to the prosecution, Abdulqader has been in Syria multiple times since 2015, where he has “fought alongside different jihadist terrorist groups”. It published four photos of the accused wearing military uniform, holding various weapons, and pointing a finger towards the sky. (Fig. 11)

Figure 11: Two of the four photos of Mohammed Abdulqader released by the Specialised Prosecutor’s Office on 1 July 2020. The photos were taken in 2015-2016 in Syria when he was 16 years old.30

The prosecution claimed that Abdulqader had a “secret” social media profile under the name “Mohammed, the Jihadi”, and that there is a secret witness against him. Meanwhile, various pundits speculated on Bulgarian television that Abdulqader and his father were involved with the terrorist group ISIS, although in one of the four photos released by the prosecution, only the red flag of the Sultan Murad Division can be seen. Abdulqader was 16 when his supposed crime took place. His lawyer, Ivaylo Naidenov, insisted that there was no proof of him ever participating in fighting, and that he had not seen any substantial evidence put forward by the prosecution. Abdulqader’s mother said her son took photos of himself in Syria to show off in front of his peers and pointed to his social media accounts in Facebook and Instagram, both of which contain images of him in Syria, posted over the past four years. In this period, Abdulqader and his mother would occasionally go to meet his father, mostly in Turkey and on rare occasions in Syria. His wrestling coach Nikolai Dachev, who has trained him since he was 12, was aware of these trips but they were always for a short period. Jammu, Abdulqader’s father, gave up fighting three years ago and currently has a civilian job at a border crossing on the Turkish-Syrian border.31 Three months later on 6 October, the Appellate Specialized Criminal Court decided that Mohammed Abdulkader, accused of terrorism abroad, should remain in custody.32 Ruslan Trad, a Syrian-Bulgarian journalist commenting on the “Mohammed Case”, criti-alyzed the actions of the prosecution with the following words: “The people leading this court case have no idea what Sultan Murad Division does in Syria. The expertise is minimal.” According to Trad, there has been increasing pressure by the Bulgarian authorities on the Syrian community over the past few years. In 2019, five Syrian citizens were arrested in Bulgaria for “financing terrorism”, but the charges could not be proven, so they were eventually released.33

On 19 October 2020, Krystian Szkwarek, a representative of the group European Conservatives and Reformists for Bulgaria, Europe’s leading conservative movement, shared on his Facebook page an opinion (later reflected by media outlets such as blitz.bg and tribune.bg), in which he uses unacceptable qualifications against Islam and the Prophet Muhammad. He stated, “This is the first known caricature of Muhammad from Cluny Abbey dating back to 1142 [a drawing by the 12th-century abbot Peter the Venerable showing the Prophet as a monstrous siren]. ‘Charlie Hebdo’ is not the pioneer in our reasonable mokceries of the Arab cutthroat, who slept with underage girls, and of the disgusting religion created by him.”35 The text violates Article 164, Paragraph 1 of the Penal Code, namely “preaching and incitement to discrimination, violence or hatred through speech, press or other mass media, through electronic information systems or in any other way.” As usually, state security agencies did not react to this anti-Muslim statement.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

Major figures triggering Islamophobia in Bulgaria are the leaders - including MPs and MEPs - of the far-right nationalist parties and movements NFSB, IMRO, Ataka, Vazrazhdane, Bulgarian National Union – New Democracy, National Resistance, Blood and Honour, and Fortress Europe Alliance. They are backed by various channels for dissemination of anti-Muslim propaganda such as media organs, either owned by their parties or state channels, radio programmes, and the daily press. The producers of these media outlets evaluate the participation of “scandalous” politicians and the broadcasting of hate speech as a source of increased viewer/listener/reader interest and higher ratings - a process undisturbed by any kind of censorship or state control.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

On 8 December 2020, an online meeting titled “Addressing Anti-Muslim Hate Crimes and the Security Needs of Muslim Communities”, initiated by the OSCE Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR) was held. The online forum, moderated by Christie Edwards, was dedicated to the OSCE publication “Practical Guide on Understanding Anti-Muslim Hate Crimes - Addressing the Security Needs of Muslim Communities”. Bulgaria’s Muslim community was represented at the conference by Hayri Emin, an expert at the International Affairs Department of the Chief Mufti’s Office. Asked to comment on the results of the local Muslim community’s co-operation with the OSCE, Emin said Bulgaria was one of the countries where ODIHR training for dealing with hate crimes for law enforcement agencies has been successfully completed and that the Chief Mufti’s Office has made an indisputable contribution to this initiative. Nevertheless, bias-motivated crimes are rarely investigated in sufficient detail to reveal the true cause of the misconducts, and usually the latter are treated as hooliganism. In Emin’s opinion, since institutions such as the police and the prosecution are highly homogeneous, encouraging people from minorities to join them is likely to empower positive developments in the fight against antireligious hatred in society.37

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

The content of this report shows that in Islamophobic terms, 2020 was dominated by instances of anti-Muslim hate speech rather than physical attacks on Muslims and mosques. Populist politicians took the momentum to unleash hatred towards Muslims by exploiting negative historical sentiments, problems within the Roma communities, and concerns mounted due to the movement of refugees from the Middle East passing through Bulgaria on their way to Europe. Despite the fact that the domestic criminal code contains articles sanctioning this type of discourses, these are rarely applied. Therefore, there is an acute need for NGOs to monitor media on a daily basis, and to generate pressure on the judiciary to take adequate action in cases and events dictated by Islamophobia and to restrain from arresting and charging Muslims for the sake of simulating anti-terror activity. Presumably, over time, this civilian pressure is expected to generate a preventative effect and force politicians to abstain from using hate-speech publicly, and authorities from treating the local Muslim community as a threat to national security. The media should use the opportunities afforded to them to change the negative image of Islam by broadcasting programmes discussing up-to-date Islamic issues. The lack of adequate knowledge about Islam enables the spread of biased stereotypes in the public domain. Educational institutions also have to work towards creating an alternative narrative regarding Muslims. In the long list of authors of history textbooks, there are no Muslims. Keeping in mind that the curricula include topics related to Islam, the Bulgarian Ministry of Education should engage if not an author, at least an adviser appointed by the Chief Muftiate in Sofia to comment on the content from a Muslim perspective. Local Muslims should also be involved in a more objective and constructive rewriting of Bulgaria’s history.

Executive Summary

In 2020, in Croatia, Islamophobic attacks and hate speech against Muslims were mostly concentrated on social networks. In the sphere of politics, no major Islamophobic incidents were recorded, which is especially significant keeping in mind that 2020 was a year of parliamentary elections in Croatia. Politicians did not play on the card of strengthening Islamophobia because they concluded that this kind of story “does not pass” in the Republic of Croatia, Croatia preferring to lay emphasis on the good integration of local Muslims into Croatian society. There have been sporadic local incidents, but there can be no talk of systemic Islamophobia in the Republic of Croatia. It is worth noting that the cause of the strengthening of Islamophobia in a certain segment was the so-called migrant crisis on the border of Croatia, which is the external border of the European Union with Bosnia and Herzegovina and Serbia where migrants daily try to enter the European Union. In reporting, the media use problematic framing to describe militant events, talking about “radical Islam,” etc. There is a lack of understanding of this kind of discourse in media reporting. The public institutions of the Republic of Croatia, as well as religious communities, spread the messages of unity and respect for each person, and show the will to respect diversity and live together in harmony. This can be partly attributed to the successful integration of local Muslims into Croatian society, and the formal recognition of Islam as an official religion in Croatia. Every global crisis entails a deepening of social differences and tensions, both locally and globally. The COVID-19 pandemic has brought with it the problems of modern civilization in terms of relationships with the other and the different stemming from increased fear and insecurity – this is especially true in relation to the rise of Islamophobia. In general, we can say that as the pandemic intensified, there were more and more cases of outbursts of racism against minorities, migrants, refugees, asylum seekers, and Muslims. In summary, anti-Muslim intolerance represents sporadic outbursts by individuals who are certainly in the minority in Croatia. Comparing Croatia with other European countries, we can conclude that even in 2020, Croatian society does not follow the trend of the increasing Islamophobia in the rest of Europe.
Sažetak

U Hrvatskoj u 2020. godini govori mržnje prema muslimanima, te islamofobni napadi su bili većinom koncentrirani u području govora mržnje na društvenim mrežama, odnosno komentarima građana na određene događaje u Europi, posebice terorističke napade u Beču i Parizu. U sferi politike nisu zabilježeni veći islamofobni incidenti vrjedni spomena, što je posebice značajno imajući u vidu da je 2020. godina bila godine parlamentarnih izbora u Hrvatskoj. Političari nisu igrali na kartu jačanja islamofobije jer su zaključili da ta vrsta priče ne prolazi u Republici Hrvatskoj imajući u vidu dobru integriranost domaćih muslimana u ovdašnje društvo. Bilo je sporadičnih lokalnih incidenta, ali se ne može govoriti o sustavnoj islamofobiji u RH. Vrijedi napomenuti da je uzrok jačanja islamofobije u određenom segmenatu bio prema migrantima uslijed migrantske krize na granici RH koja je vanjska granica Europske unije s granicom BiH i Srbije gdje se nalaze migranti koji se svakodnevno pokušavaju domoći EU. U izvještavanju mediji koriste nepsretne kovanice riječi kojima opisuju nemile terorističke događaje, govoreći o “radikalnom islamu” potencirajući da je islam kao religija radikalna, a ne ljudi koji pogrešno tumače vjeru itd. Primjetno je nerazumijevanje takve vrste diskursa u medijskom izvještavanju.

Institucije vlasti u Republici Hrvatskoj kao i druge religijske zajednice širili su poruke zajedništva, poštivanja svakog čovjeka te pokazali volju za poštivanjem različitosti i zajedničkog života. Dijelom se to može pripisati i uspješnoj integraciji domaćih muslimana u hrvatsko društvo i porukama koje šalje Islamska zajednica u Hrvatskoj, koja promovira uspješan model integracije muslimana u hrvatsko društvo već preko 100 godina. Svaka svjetska kriza sa sobom povlači produbljanje socijalnih razlika i napetosti kako na lokalnom tako i na globalnom nivou. Pandemija korona virusa sa sobom je donijela probleme suvremene civilizacije kada je u pitanju odnos prema drugom i drugačijem usljud povećanog straha i nesigurnosti, posebice prema muslimanima. Generalno možemo reći da kako se pandemija zahvatala tako su se javljali sve češći slučajevi izljeva rasizma prema manjinama, migrantima, izbjeglicama, aziijantima, muslimanima. Sumirajući, možemo reći da pokazana antimuslimanska netrpljivost predstavlja sporadične ispade pojedinaca koji su sasvim sigurno u manjini. Pored RH s drugim zemljama Europe, možemo zaključiti da niti u 2020. hrvatsko društvo ne prati trend pojačanog rasta islamofobije kao u ostatku Europe.

Introduction

The legally and institutionally regulated organization of Islam as a religion in the Republic of Croatia has prevented the deepening of Islamophobia in Croatian society. The Islamic Community in Croatia, as institutional organization, continues to play an integrative role in local society. The Republic of Croatia has used the position of the Islamic Community as a role model for Muslim minorities in Croatian society and as an instrument in building its democratic, inclusive, and intercultural state brand.

Along this line, the construction of the Islamic Cultural Center in Sisak continues and with it Croatia will get its fifth mosque (in addition to the ones in Zagreb, Rijeka, Bogovlja, and Gunja). The cornerstone in Sisak was laid in December 2016, and this year, with the installation of the final part, a 40-meter-high minaret was added.1

A significant international conference entitled “Human Brotherhood - The Foundation of Security and Peace in the World” was held in honor of two documents published in 2019: the Declaration on Human Brotherhood for World Peace and Coexistence, which promotes Christian-Muslim relations, and the Charter of Mecca that promotes dialogue between civilizations.

The conference was opened by then President of the Republic of Croatia Kolinda Grabar-Kitarović and the Secretary General of the League of the Muslim World (MWL) Muhammad bin Abdul Kerim Al-Issa with the participation of guests from 36 countries. The conference was organized by the Mesehiat of the Islamic Community in Croatia and the World Muslim League in cooperation with the Episcopal Conference of Croatia (HBK). Theses that Croatia is “a wonderful example of building bridges of love, dialogue and understanding” could be heard at the conference.

The conference was attended by the entire Croatian state leadership, high representatives of the Catholic Church, representatives of the Jewish community in Croatia, representatives of the Serbian Orthodox Church in Croatia, and many others.2

The conference was held in Zagreb as part of the program of the Croatian Presidency of the Council of the European Union, which focused on human brotherhood as the basis of peace and security in the world.3

The Muslim World League donated US$300,000 to the Croatian government for combating the COVID-19 pandemic and also donated funds to the Is-

Islamic community in Zagreb for the repair of the damage caused by the March 22 earthquake.⁴

Meetings of the heads of the Islamic Community in Croatia with state leaders were frequent. At one of them, Zoran Milanović, the newly elected president of Croatia, emphasized that the Republic of Croatia is an example of good integration and of the tradition of respecting and preserving the religious and cultural foundations of Islam as exemplified in the long-standing, exceptional cooperation of the Islamic Community with all state and local government units in Croatia. Likewise, the representatives of the Mesihat of the Islamic Community pointed to the Republic of Croatia as an example of respecting and promoting the highest standards of religious tolerance in building a society of understanding and trust. According to the statement, Al-Issa praised Grabar-Kitarović’s commitment to promoting a policy of peace, tolerance, cooperation, and respect for all religions and peoples.⁵

The Islamic Community in Croatia hosted a gala dinner to celebrate Eid al-Fitr with the presence of all state leaders whose presence testifies to their good relations with the country’s Islamic Community and Muslims. The President of the Republic of Croatia Kolinda Grabar-Kitarović, Prime Minister of the Republic of Croatia Andrej Plenković, Speaker of the Croatian Parliament Gordan Jandroković, and President of the Episcopal Conference of Croatia (HBK) Zelimir Puljić expressed their wishes on the occasion of Eid al-Fitr and Eid al-Adha to the Mufti and President of the Islamic Community of Croatia Aziz Effendi Hasanović and all Muslims in Croatia with the warm messages of coexistence, respect, and acceptance as values underpinning the intercultural Croatian society.7

The Security Intelligence Agency Report (SOA)8 for last year states that the security situation in the Republic of Croatia is stable, and that in 2019/2020 there were no events or occurrences that would significantly jeopardize the country’s security situation. The report states that there are currently no indications or visible potential for a significant destabilization of the security situation. The militant threat to Croatia remains low. Out of a total of seven people (two men and five women) who traveled to DEASH-controlled areas and who have Croatian citizenship, according to available data, two men and one woman died in 2017 and 2018 in Syria/Iraq, and other women are still in civilian camps controlled by Kurdish-Arab forces in Syria.9

One case of a Croatian citizen being arrested by the Turkish police while traveling to Syria to fight in the ranks of ISIL was recorded. He was 20-year-old man from the Croatian town of Koprivnica, who converted to Islam. The daily newspaper Jutarnji found out that the man had been under the supervision of the Croatian security services for a long time.10

During an interview of Minister of Foreign and European Affairs Gordan Grlić-Radman said, “About 63,000 Muslims who live in Croatia are ambassadors who can testify that Croatia is a safe country, respectable in respecting human, national, minority and religious rights.” Mufti Hasanović underlined that part of the Muslim community’s role is to “brand and promote the high standard that are developed in Croatia.”11

The issue of Croatian border safety in relation to migrants heading to Europe was raised several times in public discourse and media. The question of the line between ensuring the security of Croatian territory and a human approach and compassion for refugees was raised.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

In 2020, Croatian Ombudsman Lora Vidović submitted the Ombudsman Report for 2019 to the Croatian Parliament. It stated that Croatia witnessed positive examples of interreligious dialogue. The Association for Religious Freedom in the Republic of Croatia has been a positive example of interreligious dialogue and cooperation for many years. Also, the Islamic Community in Croatia organized numerous conferences, meetings, and other activities within the Center for the Culture of Dialogue, in which mainly young people participated with the aim of spreading ideas of tolerance and combating religious prejudices and stereotypes. The report stated that the events all aimed to strengthen interreligious and intercultural dialogue, respect for human rights, and the prevention of discrimination based on religion.

In addition to fake news, hate speech is present in the public space via newspaper articles, comments below online articles, online user posts, graffiti, pictures, verbal abuse, songs, or gestures. Hate speech is directed, among others, at members of religious communities and migrants. In addition, hate speech was recorded in a small section of media, publications, and headlines such as “Why Do We Call the Invasion of the Islamic World Migration?”

Few domestic and international NGOs have accused Croatian police of the systematic rejection of migrants trying to enter Croatia and the EU from Bosnia and Herzegovina. NGOs accused the police of extreme violence, collective expulsion of migrants and denial of asylum, which the Ministry of Internal Affairs persistently denies. The Danish Refugee Council (DRC) has documented an unusually large number of so-called pushbacks, or the forcible return of migrants from Croatia to BIH. The Council of Europe’s Commissioner for Human Rights Dunja Mijatović called on Croatian authorities to end “pushbacks” and violence at the border and to start punishing police officers responsible for serious violations of migrants’ human rights.

Different media such as British newspaper The Guardian and several German media including Süddeutsche Zeitung (SZ), Bild-Zeitung, Die Zeit, and the public service ARD have written about complaints against Croatian authorities and published statements by migrants claiming that they are being forcibly returned to BIH territory.

The Croatian government has denied all these accusations and complained that the human approach that the Croatian police has toward migrants is not reported in the media. The Ministries of Internal and Foreign and European Affairs declared that the Croatian police at the border is doing an important job and protecting the EU from illegal migration.

An incident in Zadar based on religious and national intolerance was also reported in the media. Namely, hate speech and an arsenal of threats were heard because of disputed neighborhood rights in an attack on Muslim neighbors by local residents in October in a hamlet in the area of the Municipality of Razanac.

The year 2020 was marked by a hate crime where insulting graffiti appeared on the Zagreb Mosque including a message about the first President of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina Alija Izetbegović and the current president of the leading Bosniak Party of Democratic Action (SDA) in BiH, Bakir Izetbegović. The Islamic Community in Croatia condemned this act of vandalism. The attack happened immediately before the elections for minority representatives including Bosniaks for the Parliament of the Republic of Croatia.

In September 2020, graffiti with the inscriptions “Ustaše Brda 1950” and “Death to Muslims” appeared on the notch of the railway, in front of the entrance to the tunnel on Dujmovaca, in the town of Split. Media reported it as a shameful inscription. The Islamic Community in Croatia in its press release stated that they received news about this event with great disappointment and regret.

Local citizens of the city of Pula reacted to the news of the building of a new Islamic cultural center in Pula with protests. Residents of Pula’s Monte Serpa oppose the construction of an Islamic cultural center in their neighborhood, although it is only a matter of moving from an old, unsuitable building in the center of Pula to a new location. Daniel Deković, president of the local board of Busoler, in whose territory the plot for the construction of the Islamic Cultural Center is located, said that the residents “don’t want Vienna in Pula,” alluding to the terrorist attack that took place in Vienna in 2020. Later on, in a statement, he said the above comment was taken out of context, and that he and locals had been declared the biggest Islamophobes. He even said that he had information that the center would accept migrants and integrate them into the community, and that locals feared that extremists would come with them. The announcement of the construction of the Islamic Cultural Center in Pula attracted a great deal of public attention.

Figure 4: Flyer during the organized protest in Pula against the construction of Islamic Cultural Center in Pula. It states, “Miletić (City Mayor) stop violence against the majority, stop the violence against our tradition. NO to the Islamization by the wishes of our City Mayor and his friends. Today the mosque, tomorrow the 30m high minaret… and a day after tomorrow? It is true: Pula is a European city. Pula has 3,000 years of European and Christian tradition before all. State your position clearly and loudly. Does your city need that?”

Employment

The Croatian Ombudsman received complaints regarding the right of Muslims to a paid non-working day for religious holidays. Several complainants pointed to potential discrimination against non-Catholics for displaying religious symbols in public, primarily in schools and hospitals, while the ombudsman also received a complaint for holding blessings in county offices during business hours.

Education

The Islamic Community in Croatia delivered a lecture to the participants of the Diplomatic Academy of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Croatia about Islam, Islamophobia, and the position of Muslims in Europe and the world. Educational programs with an anti-Islamophobic dimension in 2020 were postponed or delivered online as a result of the pandemic.

Politics

The city councilor of Split Martin Pauk created an event on his Facebook profile under the name “Throwing cracklings and bacon on the state border.” In it, he pointed out that he will throw cracklings and bacon at the border to protect Croatia from migrants. Pauk explained that the event that will take place at the Bajakovo border crossing on April 9 and 10 as a “blessing of the state border,” and announced bonus points for those who bring a live domestic pig. He said that since the national government is not showing enough seriousness or preparedness regarding the upcoming migrant invasion from Turkey, it is time to at least show our readiness to protect all our citizens with humor. He claimed that the current situation is the tip of the iceberg of the developments of recent decades, and that it has only one real name - "The invasion and occupation of Europe." Pauk stated that the event is a message that Croats must ensure the future of Europe, Europeans and their children.26

The politician and independent parliament member Marijana Petir, known for her statement from 2015 saying that Christians were persecuted by Muslims in wars and that the current “refugee crisis” was in fact an attempt by Muslims to occupy predominantly Catholic European countries including Croatia, suggested a proposal worth 1.5 million HRK in the form of aid to Christians prosecuted for their faith in countries where Islamist militants are in power. The government accepted the proposal.28

On his Facebook profile, the former presidential candidate and former MP Ivan Pernar stated that imams who advocate the theory of global Islamization support mass migrations with the aim of making Muslims the majority in Europe. This is despite the fact, he claimed, that the Muslims who will become the majority will have nothing to do with Europeans, their language, culture, etc. Along the way, he addressed Bosniaks from BIH, saying that they “should be smart” and know how to react to the current migration events. He called on Bosniaks to put national identity (Slavic) above religious (Islam) identity.29

One of the media in BIH reacted to Pernar’s Facebook post with the following title: “Recruitment of ‘White’ Bosniaks: Explicit Fascism and Racism by Ivan Pernar.”31 The mayor of Pula Boris Miletić tried to calm the situation when the announcement of building the new Islamic Cultural Center in Pula was published by stating that locals should be rational and calm the tensions. He stated that the Islamic Center in Pula has existed for more than 50 years and that it is nothing new. He called for tolerance and the reduction of prejudice.32

Media

Columnist Ivica Sola pointed out in a column written for Slobodna Dalmacija (Hanza Media) that the conversion of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul into a mosque is a dangerous message to Croats in BIH.

31. Ibid.
Columnist for Slobodna Dalmacija Visnja Staresina wrote a column titled “The Crown Symbol of the Submission of Christianity to Islam: Erdogan’s Adhan to the West from the Hagia Sophia.” She wrote that in the shadow of the COVID-19 pandemic, a new strain in U.S.-China relations, defining an EU model to help recover from the pandemic, and domestic post-election issues, it has gone almost unnoticed that Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan fulfilled a long-held wish. According to the Staresina, what he announced a quarter of a century ago in the elections for the post of mayor of Istanbul, Erdogan achieved these days as an uncrowned sultan of the Bosphorus.33

Columnist Davor Dijanović wrote an article entitled “Will Christian Europe Fall under Islamic terrorists?”34 elaborating the question of whether Europe will realize what is happening and finally come to its senses.

Also, columnist and professor Ivica Sola in an interview for Slobodna Dalmacija commented on Muslims in Europe by saying that in contrast to Chancellor Kurz and the politically correct European elites who see but do not want or are afraid to tell the truth, he is free to say the following: “This is an invasion, not immigration, this is a war against Europe and the rest of the Christian remnants. Pure jihad out of hatred towards Europe.”35

An exclusive interview with Geert Wilders, the party leader of the PVV (Partij voor de Vrijheid), the star of the new European radical right, was reported in the Croatian media Jutarnji. He claimed that as soon as he becomes prime minister of the Netherlands, he will immediately stop mass Islamic immigration.36

The Croatian National Television (HRT) broadcasted live Eid players in 2020. HRT also reported on the international conference “Human Brotherhood – The Foundation of Security and Peace in the World” that was organized by the Islamic Community in Croatia and supported by the president and prime minister of the Republic of Croatia and the Catholic Archdiocese. Shows on HRT such as “Dnevnik” (Daily News), “Dobro jutro Hrvatska” (Good Morning Croatia), and “Zajedno u duhu” (Together in the Spirit), as well as HR’s show “Susret u dijalogu” (Meeting in Dialogue) broadcast reportages on Islam and Muslims in Croatia.

Despite the recommendation of the Civil Protection Headquarters of the Republic of Croatia that religious services should be broadcast on television and radio, only the services of the Catholic Church were transmitted and those of other religious minority communities weren’t.

Justice System
We can say that the citizens in the Republic of Croatia, even when they are discriminated due to their religious affiliation, are reluctant to report such cases. This is the reason why there is no real insight into the number of cases of discrimination against Muslims in Croatia. Unfortunately, regarding the insulting messages on the Zagreb Mosque, the perpetrator has not been found as of yet. Croatian Ombudsman initiated proceedings due to the alleged dissatisfaction of citizens regarding the planned construction of the Islamic Center in Pula.

Internet
Croatian news portal narod.hr shared columns that Ivica Sola wrote for Slobodna Dalmacija in which Islam was mentioned in a negative context. One of them was titled “This Is a War against Europe and the Rest of the Remnants of Christians,” alluding to the fact that Christian Croats should be careful of Islam and Muslims.

Via the Internet on behalf of the Croatian government and his own person, Prime Minister Andrej Plenković congratulated the President of the Mesihhat of the Islamic Community in Croatia, Mufti Aziz Effendi Hasanović, and all citizens of the Islamic faith on the occasion of Eid al-Adha. “Let this holiday season be an opportunity to reminisce about the importance of a culture of dialogue, mutual tolerance and understanding, and an opportunity for further progress in nurturing existing good relations, of which we are particularly proud,” the Croatian prime minister said.37

The international conference “Human Brotherhood – The Foundation of Security and Peace in the World” was held in Zagreb in February 2020. It was given significant attention in online media, spreading the messages of dialogue.

However, it should be noted that migrants are often portrayed in an unacceptable way and certain media continue to market content filled with hate speech.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network
The central figures that portrayed Islam in a negative context, spreading hatred, can be divided into politicians and the media sector. The first group consists of politicians such as Martin Pauk, Ivan Pernar, and Mirjana Petir. The second group consists of journalists and columnists like Ivica Sola, Davor Dijanović, and Visnja Sta-resina who wrote for different media outlets such as Slobodna Dalmacija (Hanza Media) and Hrvatski tjednik.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The Islamic Community in Croatia is an associate of the Center for Cultural Dialogue in implementing the project “New Neighbors - Inclusion of Persons Granted with International Protection in Croatian Society.” This covers 200 people who have been granted asylum, is organized to last for three years, and is valued at about 14.4 million HRK. The project is being co-financed by the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund (AMIF), which is managed by the Interior Ministry and partially from the state budget.38

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

The Islamophobic incidents mentioned in the report do not have wider public support, a significant number of followers, or even a driving potential. They can be treated as individual outbursts and actions by single individuals. No kind of extremism has the driving force or potential to overthrow a democratic constitutional order, provoke violence, incidents, or large-scale conflicts. Although, we can still note the peaceful coexistence between Muslims and other religious groups in Croatia, we can also track raised prejudices towards Muslims in light of the murders in Vienna, Paris, and Nice that occurred in 2020.

Government efforts showcased a will to strengthen intercultural Croatian society making it more inclusive, empathetic, and resilient, and to fight growing mistrust and polarization in Europe.

Incidents that can be characterized as Islamophobic - even though some of them have the indicators of hatred based on nationality - were treated institutionally with condemnation and were processed systematically by the supervisory authorities.

The easily available online tools and the apparent anonymity of authors on the Internet provided a space for spreading hate speech in the virtual world, which is usually overlooked by authorities. Hate speech should be strategically reduced. The line between hate speech and the human right of freedom of expression should be more precisely defined. Public figures, such as politicians, and public influencers, such as journalists, should be closely reviewed and held accountable for spreading hatred.

Executive Summary

The general phenomenon of Islamophobia in the Czech Republic may be analysed on four levels: Islamophobic acts, expressions of intolerance, hostile or prejudiced stereotypes, and anti-Islamic discourse. Islamophobic hate crimes are marginal and have been in decline since 2016: seven incidents have been recorded by a human rights organisation during the first three quarters of 2020. One was of a particular symbolic violence: a threat was spray-painted on the mosque in Brno in January. Public expressions of intolerance continue to be feared especially by veiled women, but few have been recorded. With the pandemic leading to limited physical contact, most expressions of public intolerance occur on the Internet. In 2020, three people were given suspended sentences for condoning last year’s attacks in Christchurch. During the year in question, there was no information about similar incidents in the aftermath of the terror attacks in Paris, Nice, Dresden, and Vienna. On a positive note, mainstream media reported on those attacks in a generally dispassionate tone and largely without hostile stereotypes. The far-right SPD party, especially its leader Tomio Okamura, remains the most influential source of anti-immigrant and anti-Islam discourse. On the other hand, a sizeable and influential disinformation media scene has emerged in which the attacks were framed in a hostile way. In this milieu, a new phenomenon has been developing: a more complex version of anti-Islamic discourse. Whereas the first influential public expressions of Islamophobia originated in single-issue anti-Muslim activism, recently an “identitarian” scene has been consolidating around the myth of the Great Replacement which includes an explicit hostility to Islam, liberal elites, and the EU. In the summer of 2020, the second meeting of a small number of former politicians, far-right MPs and activists, anti-Islamists, and disinformation media editors received the official backing of Miloš Zeman, the Czech president. If his own anti-Muslim rhetoric has declined, the identitarian scene seems to thrive.

Introduction
The year 2020 progressed under the sign of the Covid-19 pandemic. The country was under lockdowns from 12 March to 30 May, and again from 5 October onwards. In this context, public attention was concerned with the public health crisis and the consequences of the restrictions on social and economic life. Therefore, public and political activities slowed down significantly, and along with them racist and xenophobic activities. During the first two months of 2020, public debates were stirred by several issues: the killing of Qasem Soleimani, the change of the public defender of rights (ombudsman), and several court cases. All three issues were picked up by anti-Islam activists in early 2020. In October and November, however, when the terror attacks occurred in Paris, Nice, Dresden, and Vienna – in the vicinity of the Czech Republic – the country was preoccupied by the strain on the public health system, the record death toll and, to date, no significant anti-Islam acts followed.

Anti-Islam activism has several sources in the Czech Republic. The primary source had long been single-issue anti-Islam online activism. After exiting the margins and entering mainstream media and political debates in 2015-2016, the various anti-Islam formations failed to start political parties and to enter local councils or parliament, and ended up as internal conflicts. Their rhetoric has largely been “stolen” by the parliamentary far-right populists. Anti-Islam activists either published books and exited activism or adopted other issues (such as larger conspiracy theories and anti-gender activism) or morphed into neo-conservative groups that attract a large number of rightist politicians, journalists, and other public figures. If their anti-Islam activism has lost its original edge, their discourse has since entered a conservative mainstream, including a series of stereotypes about Islam and migration.

Today's main source of anti-Islam activism is the populist far right (currently represented by the SPD party of Tomio Okamura and Trikolóra of Václav Klaus Jr) who use anti-migrant, anti-Islam, and anti-EU activism to stir the public constantly and to remain relevant. As elsewhere in Europe, the pandemic has put the government in the spotlight and deprived the far right of media space. Since early 2020, with the exception of several smaller episodes in the summer of 2020, the far right has been rather invisible.

On the other hand, the pandemic will only increase the impact of online media and networks, whose negative impact on hate speech and hate crimes was discussed in early 2020. Significantly, throughout 2020, it was possible to observe the online spreading and consolidation of a new master frame for an anti-Islam conspiracy theory, the so-called Great Replacement.

With the above exceptions, 2020 has confirmed the gradual - if slow - tackling of anti-Islam prejudice by state institutions (police, courts), the side-lining of the anti-Islam agenda of far-right parties in the context of public health crisis, and also the unchecked spread of more sophisticated and complex forms of prejudice.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

On 3 January, the mosque in Brno, the second-largest city in the Czech Republic, was sprayed with the threatening graffiti “Do not spread Islam in the Czech Republic or we will kill you!”. According to the leader of the local community, there had not been an attack of this kind against the mosque since 2016. After a period of calm, this attack came in a form of direct threat.¹ The community requested a police presence during Friday prayers, and the police guarded the mosque for three weeks.² The act was condemned by Prime Minister Andrej Babiš, leaders of TOP09, and the Christian democratic parties.

Figure 1: “Do not spread Islam in the Czech Republic or we will kill you”. The graffiti was sprayed on the mosque in Brno on 3 January 2020.³

Mainstream media reminded the public of the earlier culmination of anti-Islam acts in the aftermath of the 2015 so-called refugee crisis and connected the mosque attack to the intense public debate that followed the killing of Qasem Soleimani in Baghdad. The killing was interpreted as a reckless act that could cause a larger Middle East conflagration. The Czech anti-Islam scene accused Muslims of this act – the ex-Muslim and today’s main authority in the anti-Islam scene Lukáš Lhotan elaborated on this accusation on the anti-Islam portal eurabia.cz.

The available state statistics refer to hate crimes generally (defamation of an Ethnic or Other Group [§355] and Incitement to National and Racial Hate [§356]) and not to Islamophobic acts specifically. There were 153 recorded cases of incitement to hate as of mid-November, which is roughly similar to the numbers of 2019. There were 64 cases of recorded hate crimes in the first 6 months of 2020. According to the Ministry of Interior’s report on extremism and hate crime for 2019, there were 5 cases of violent injury and 27 cases of violence or threat of violence against a group of people; 26 cases of offenses of a racist or similar character; and 46 cases of hate mongering against a race or ethnic group.

Islamophobic incidents remain a marginal phenomenon. Most often, Roma are the victims of hate crimes. Only a fraction of recorded hate crime incidents was directed at Islam or Muslims. The In Iustitia human rights organisation specialising in helping victims of hate crimes recorded seven incidents of anti-Muslim prejudice in the first three quarters of 2020. However, one of them was particularly violent: in July, an Arab man was brutally attacked and abused for his ethnic identity by the well-known neo-Nazi Vladan Weiss. The perpetrator was sentenced to 5.5 years in prison but without taking into account the prejudiced content of the attack. According to the statistics of the Ministry of Interior, the number of hate crimes has nevertheless been steadily decreasing in the last ten years: from the high numbers of 248 (2006), 265 (2009), and 252 (2010) to 143 (2016), 153 (2017), 179 (2018), and 170 (2019). There were 144 indictments and 19 sentences concerning general hate crimes in 2020.
Islamophobic incidents have also been declining after a peak in the aftermath of the so-called refugee crisis of 2015 and 2016. There might, in fact, be a real decrease as a result of the fact that Islam has not been presented as the number one public threat for some time. Another explanation is the incapacity or unwillingness of state prosecutors to classify criminal acts as crimes motivated by hate because of the legal and practical difficulty to impute motivations to crimes such as vandalism.

Muslims, just behind Roma, remain the most frequent victims of public expressions of hate speech. According to a lawyer of In Iustitia human rights organisation, especially women wearing the hijab have practically all experienced bullying, verbal abuse, or discrimination. In Iustitia has recorded one incident involving Islamophobic hate speech directed at a veiled woman at a supermarket in the second part of 2020. The fear of discrimination, of being verbally attacked or, at the very least, receiving displeasing remarks accompanies many veiled women when they move through public space. According to the testimony widely covered by mainstream media, many veiled women prefer to take private cars to avoid public transport, avoid bathing in full-body bathing suits, or cover their heads with baseball caps. There are around 1,000 Muslims in the Czech Republic who wear a veil. Because of few but recurring incidents, Islamic communities tend to keep a low profile in fear of reactions. Still, representatives of Muslim communities have not recorded any other major incident this year apart from the graffiti on the mosque in Brno.

Employment

As stated in previous reports on Islamophobia in the Czech Republic, there is no data available on employment of Muslims in particular, and there is no indication of a discrimination complaint made by a Muslim. The Muslims who have lived in the Czech Republic for a long time are well integrated socially. Asylum seekers or newly arrived migrants who have weak language skills or little local knowledge are at a greater risk. There is a network of state-sponsored Integration Centres that offer language courses, legal advice, and personal assistance to legal migrants from outside the EU. They employ Arabic speakers who attend to the needs of people dealing with administration and the labour market. There are several organisations offering free legal advice to asylum seekers and private Christian groups that support Arab refugee families in their job seeking and in the education needs of their children.

Education

Schools are not shielded from wider social trends such as the spread of anti-Islam conspiracy theories. The Teachers’ Journal published a long interview with the leading anti-Islam figure Petr Hampl under the title “Europe Is Surely in the Process of Islamisation” in January 2020.18 (Fig. 2) Hampl is a sociologist who completed his doctorate in 2015 and who is the main proponent of the so-called replacement theory in the Czech Republic. Hampl has warned against an “Islamisation” of Czech schools that he described as “the greatest cultural change since the arrival of Slavic people on our territory.”19 Because the Teachers’ Journal is an independent weekly widely subscribed by school headmasters, the interview provoked a reaction by the respected education NGO Eduin and a media debate. Eduin expressed its regret that a specialised journal had joined the “politically incorrect” trend of the disinformation media on account of anti-Islam and also anti-climate change attitudes.20

Several initiatives have been working on giving teachers access to teaching materials and general sources of information on, among others, Islam, multicultural societies, and conflicts in the Middle East. The NGO People in Need has a programme entitled “One World in Schools” that brings debates around human rights films to secondary schools throughout the country and regularly updates related teaching material. Individual teachers invite Islam experts for lectures on current issues. The closing of schools has pushed many such initiatives online, depriving both teachers and pupils of meaningful interaction with new knowledge and current events. The long-term effect of the 2020 lockdowns may be the strengthening of the above-mentioned tendency towards opinion bubbles and conspiracy theories.

Politics

The populist far-right party SPD has been classified as the “most influential subject inciting hate in the Czech society” in the “2019 Report on Extremism in the Czech Republic” published by the Ministry of the Interior in 2020.21 The SPD gained 10% in the 2017 parliamentary elections and secured several influential parliamentary positions, including the position of the vice-president of the assembly. It has used its position in the parliament to convene anti-migrant and anti-Islam events. In January 2020, the SPD again raised its hostile position to the Islamic veil during a debate about the selection of a new ombudsman. In reaction to the parting of the former ombudswoman Anna Šabatová, Tomio Okamura criticised her for defending the veiled medical school student in parliament. A controversy ensued, where rightist and populist MPs from the SPD, ANO, and Trikolóra faced criticism from the Pirate Party.22 In 2018, the SPD had proposed a bill to ban head covering and the niqab, referring to similar bans in Europe.23 The proposals were not even discussed, but the SPD keeps the matter alive through various controversies. The subsequent lockdown limited public appearances and the popularity of the SPD has been in decline.

In October 2020, municipal and senate elections were held despite the rising Covid-19 cases. The elections brought a sensible setback to the ruling parties and proved that migration-related fear mongering no longer paid off. In two instances, a centre-right politician (Petr Bendů, ODS) and a centre-left one (Jan Groins, ČSSD) tried to use the issue of migration to win electoral votes but in both cases failed to get elected.

On the other hand, outgoing or former politicians continue to make use of their public notoriety and to keep up their public relevance by continued reference to the migration issue. President Miloš Zeman, who introduced anti-Islam activists to the public domain back in 2015, has largely been silent during the past year, probably due to age-related exhaustion. In the summer of 2020, he officially supported the gathering of neo-conservative, xenophobic conspiracy theorists (more below). The former president Václav Klaus, who employs many of those figures, resurfaced on the national holiday of 28 October – without a face mask. In a subsequent interview, he downplayed the severity of the pandemic and said that “face mask-wearing people are migrant welcome.” In this manner, he linked two anti-systemic sectors of public opinion: those who demonise migration and those who reject Covid-19 as a conspiracy and refuse to wear the mandatory mask. It is not surprising that migration has ended up linked to Covid-19 by similar conspiracy theory logic.

The Czech Republic continues to refuse to give humanitarian asylum to underage migrants from Greek refugee camps, despite local preparedness, the willingness of Czech organisations, and the humanitarian disaster on the islands. In January, Minister of Interior Jan Hamáček justified the refusal by saying that the Greek lists contain mostly young Afghans and Pakistanis of 16 to 18 years of age who are considered a security risk by the Czech government.

Media

Two instances of Islam-related violence (the killing of Qasem Soleimani and the terror attacks in France and Austria) revealed an increasing division in the media landscape. Whereas mainstream media report in a largely dispassionate and rational way, the so-called alternative scene promotes an increasingly coherent conspiracy theory interpretation of current crises. It has not been always so. Mainstream printed and online journals, and TV shows have made a long journey since the sensationalist and stereotyping coverage of the so-called migrant crisis. Today’s discussion of Macron’s Islam policies and the Vienna shooting may be largely classified as correct and dispassionate, albeit with occasional stereotypes, lack of depth, or intentional openness to controversial opinions. Investigative, analytical, and critical outlets (such as Respekt, Hlídací Pes, Deník N, A2Larm, etc.) usually show more nuance than the mainstream media, and even more than partly sensationalist outlets such as Reflex, but the difference is not huge.

On the other hand, there is a whole “alternative scene” of websites that repost, translate, and sometimes produce news, often linked to “disinformation” webs such as the Russia-based Sputnik or the Czech website Aeronet. The list keeps changing and currently involves the following websites: pravyprostor.cz, pravdive.cz, megazpravy.cz, poken24.cz, svobodnenoviny.et, www.svobodny-svet.cz, dfenz-cz.com, prvnizpravy.cz, cz.sputniknews.com, and the longest-serving eurabia.cz. The web of mutually reposting platforms is presided by aeronet.cz and parlamentnilisty.cz. Especially the latter, an outlet partly owned by the entrepreneur in the gambling business and former senator Ivo Valenta, produces its own content but gives space to so-called alternative news.

Today’s outright anti-Islam content is almost entirely driven by such “alternative media”. The “alternative scene” spreads conspiracy theory-based readings of current events, involving anti-EU and pro-Russian positions, hostility to migration, multiculturalism, vaccination, liberalism, feminism, etc. Islam and migration no longer stand alone. They are now part of larger conspiracy theories. The Great Replacement is frequently cited. Originating in France, it purports that global liberal elites favour and organise Muslim migration to Europe in order to destroy European culture and better control their capitalist ventures. Several of the above-mentioned outlets bring master thinkers from Europe to the Czech public (e.g. Eric Zemmour) or give space to Czech proponents of such theories (Benjamin Kuras, Petr Hampl). They spread fake news such as that the Muslim Brotherhood helped Biden win the U.S. elections, or that Muslims are taking over power in France.²⁷ They give space to SPD politicians such as Radim Fiala. Foreign inspiration has given a unifying discursive frame to different positions: from anti-Islam, anti-liberal, anti-EU, anti-globalist to anti-feminist and pro-Russian. According to the Ministry of Interior’s report on extremism, “The pandemic was described as a pretext for disguising migration from Turkey to the Greek islands or as a secret tool for restricting personal freedoms and establishing a ‘new world order’.”²⁸

Unlike four years ago, anti-Islam discourse no longer dwells on purported flaws of Islam as a religion (such as accusing Prophet Muhammad of perversity), but it comfortably sits within a larger political and ideological frame of conspiracist illiberalism. Whereas instances of open anti-Muslim racism have significantly decreased in Czech public discourse, a more subtle form of discriminatory discourse is gaining ground. This “identitarian” discourse includes a contempt and hostility towards Islam, among other hostilities.

In between the mostly dispassionate mainstream and the conspiracist “alternative media”, there are online servers that cannot be classified as alternative but that provide space for a mainstream version of Islam-sceptical discourse. The conservative, government-critical Echo 24 publishes anti-Islam articles such as “How Islam Conquers France Step by Step. With the Help of the Left” based on selective arguments. On aktualne.cz, the public interest lawyer David Záhumenský keeps a blog dedicated to unmasking “political Islam”, with posts such as “Almost All of the World Is Affected [Infected] by Islam, Not Just France”. During the first pandemic wave, he called face masks “facilitators of political Islam”. Islam-sceptical authors like Záhumenský do not express an open or violent hostility to Islam but develop intense scepticism towards Islam based on selective argumentation, similar to French néo-laïcité positions. Their higher degree of factual knowledge and argumentation skills make them trusted channels for stereotypes and biases, and ultimately give credence to conspiracies.

In the first half of 2020, the Internet “continued to be flooded with anti-immigrant and anti-Muslim contributions” and “refugees were identified as vectors of the virus”, according to the Ministry of Interior’s report on extremism. The 2019 report, which was published in 2020, considers that disinformation media have become an influential tool for spreading hatred. There are measurable consequences to widespread beliefs in conspiracy theories. According to a poll commissioned by the Ministry of Interior, 29% of respondents trust the disinformation portals; 50% believe that the “EU organises a migrant wave from non-European countries”; and 60% believe that the “Muslim community in the Czech Republic poses as serious a threat as Muslim communities in Germany or France”. A cool reading of this polling question will detect a problem (the implication that Muslim communities pose a threat). In the case of the Ministry of Interior this bias is hardly an intention and rather a matter of discursive bias: the Ministry of the Interior has repeatedly refuted any danger coming from the Czech Muslim community and has made efforts towards a balanced assessment of radicalisation risks. In its 2020 report, the ministry suggested that Islamophobia leads to an increased social “isolation” of the Muslim communities. The report stated, “Extremists from both the majority and the Muslim minority contribute to the fact that whole groups are a priori perceived as at risk, dangerous and extremist. An environment of mistrust, which also comes from hateful content on social networks, is a breeding ground for radicalisation.”

Justice System

The Ombudsman Office registered just one court case related to religious discrimination. Most of the 90 discrimination cases dealt with in the Czech courts between 2015 and 2019 concerned labour discrimination - religious discrimination cases are extremely rare. The report mentions the Supreme Court’s decision to reject a ban of the hijab in classes as discriminatory.

In 2020, a new ombudsman was elected to the office: Stanislav Křeček, former deputy ombudsman. He vowed to continue the work of public defender of rights, but without so much focus on anti-discrimination. He was a candidate nominated to the office by President Miloš Zeman – known for his anti-Roma and anti-Muslim rhetoric, and his cold relations with the former ombudswoman Dr. Šabatová. Several of his early public statements have caused public outcry. In an interview for the server Seznam.cz, he stated, “Europe is being occupied by Muslims, they want to replace us, they want Muslim states and Sharia law.” The statement was subsequently widely shared by far-right parties such as SPD and alternative media. In an interview to Respekt weekly he claimed, “Muslims do not recognise the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. They reject it and have their own, in which human rights are subject to sharia,” and went on to reiterate the replacement conspiracy. Křeček expresses stereotypes that are widespread in the Czech society - taking the opposite stance to his predecessor in the office. After assuming office, he nevertheless spoke against the abuse of the freedom of speech, especially on the Internet; called for precision in the definition of hate speech; and for making the recently increased efforts to prevent hate speech by the police, the Ministry of Justice, and the Supreme Court of the Czech Republic more effective.

36. Zpráva o projevech extremismu a předsudečné nenávisti na území České republiky v roce 2019, Praha 2020, p. 15
In 2020, two prominent cases involving Muslims ended. First, the court recognised an additional compensation of 202,000 CZK to Vladimír Sáňka, the former head of the Islamic community in Prague, for unlawful prosecution. In 2014, Sáňka was accused of supporting and promoting a movement aimed at suppressing human rights and freedoms after he published a translation of The Bases of Tawheed by Bilal Philips. Sáňka was cleared of all charges in 2019 after the Supreme Court decided that Salafism was not a movement but a conservative theological school of thought. In total, Sáňka was paid 380,000 CZK (15,500 Euro) in compensation. Sáňka had asked for 10 million CZK (250,000 Euro) and a public apology.42

Second, the long-drawn “hijab case” ended in 2020 after Ayan Jammal Ahmednuurová, a refugee from Somalia, dropped the charges. She was not formally enrolled in a secondary medical school in Prague on account of her hijab in 2013. The then ombudswoman Dr. Šabatová defended the student, stating that the school had committed a discriminating act. Ahmednuurová sued the school in 2016. She lost her first and second court trial in 2017. In 2019, the Supreme Court annulled both court decisions, stating, “The applicant did not infringe the norms of social conduct, including clothing, by using a Muslim headscarf, since covering hair generally does not provoke outrage; it is common for women not only outside but also indoors. The fact that wearing the hijab is a foreign element in our society does not mean a violation of the norms of social behaviour, ethics or morality”.43 Ahmednuurová also sued the medical school for 60,000 CZK (2,200 Euro) and an apology. The hearing caused a lot of controversy. Her accusation was first rejected by the local court, then the Supreme Court annulled the rejection, stating clearly that it is possible to wear a hijab in school as a matter of individual freedom of religion. The highest court also gave a redefinition of the consequences of the secular nature of the state. Whereas the lower court argued that separation of state and religion secures the right to profess a faith and the right to be without a religious confession and the right not to be exposed to religious symbols, the highest court argued a hijab ban has not been justified in legal terms and that the pupil was the object of indirect discrimination in her quest for education.44

Ahmednuurová eventually dropped the charges in 2020. According to her lawyer, the reason was her exhaustion from continuous attacks and hostility, and the difficulty to secure accommodation and employment. Ahmednuurová is grateful for her asylum and does not want her case to be misused for hate-mongering against refugees and people of different faiths. The school appealed against her dropping the charges.

Internet

The most widespread Islamophobic violence takes the form of acts of hate speech and incitement to hate on the Internet. Because of the increase in the number and virulence of online threats, online hate speech has been actively dealt with by the public office of the Ombudsman. Under Dr. Anna Šabatová, ombudswoman until February 2020, the office focused on online hate speech and discrimination starting in 2016, directly after the increase in hate speech in the aftermath of the so-called refugee crisis and the subsequent normalisation of public expressions of Islamophobia and xenophobia. After a seminar on online hate speech in the Czech Parliament in October 2019, Šabatová published a report on hate speech on the Internet motivated by stereotypes and prejudices against a person’s colour, nation, and ethnic group, sex or sexual identity, religion, age, or health status that included detailed recommendations for Czech institutions. The recommendations were based on an earlier report on 49 court decisions in matters of hate speech from 2019 that stated that most hate speech cases were acts directed against the Roma minority (49%) and against Muslims (23%) on Facebook (83%). Only a small number of online hate speech is prosecuted and perpetrators usually leave with suspended sentences – oftentimes because they are otherwise law-abiding citizens or because they are not aware, or claim not to be aware, of the severity of such acts.

In 2020, there were four verdicts against individuals who condoned the violent attack on the Christchurch mosque in 2019. The three men and one woman were convicted to suspended sentences between 2 and 3 years. One of them was a 31-year-old sympathiser of the far-right Workers’ Party who shared a video about the Christchurch attack with the commentary “Well done”. The other three defendants expressed regret or said that they have been misunderstood. Eight other motions to indict for condoning the attacks in Christchurch, Breivik’s attacks in Norway, and attacks on Czech soldiers in Afghanistan were handed to the courts.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

The most influential figure in spreading anti-Islam positions is Tomio Okamura, the leader of the far-right SPD. The party has a single consistent line, the rejection of migration, with a related hostility to Islam. Okamura is a proponent of anti-Islam laws in the parliament and keeps posting hostile messages concerning migrants and Muslims, and reposts from Mateo Salvini on his Facebook account (263k likes) and the SPD website. The SPD has made use of anti-migration and anti-Islam rhetoric developed by single-issue anti-Islam activists (such as M. Konvička, P. Hampl, and E. Hrindová) who have not managed to transform their momentary popularity into electoral success. Besides populist co-optation, Facebook has several times closed the platform of the anti-Islam movement IVČRN (We do Not Want Islam in the Czech Republic) and only smaller groups remain active.

Since 2019, a new scene began to form. Many former anti-Islam activists and former politicians, and current far-right and extremist figures started to gather around a “patriotic” theme at a “Patriotic Meeting” (Vlastenecké setkání) in Příčovy in Central Bohemia. In 2020, several figures were present: the “anti-Islamist” Martin Konvička, as he is called by mainstream media; SPD MPs (Tomio Okamura, Jiří Kobza); several figures from the disinformation scene, e.g. Petr Hájek (Protiproud.cz, a secretary of former president Václav Klau), Petr Žantovský (journalist, host, close to Hájek); the conservative, anti-Islam publicists Benjamin Kuras and Petr Hampl; the Catholic fundamentalist Michal Semín; Presidential Spokesman Jiří Ovčáček; figures from the paramilitary Home Defence; former diplomats and physicians; a Czech émigré; and Alternative for Germany (AfD) member Jan Bartoň. The “patriotic scene” includes the “Association of Friends of a White Heterosexual Man”, the Catholic D.O.S.T., and the Institute of Vaclav Klaus. The “patriotic scene” has absorbed former anti-Islam activists into a larger narrative of a decline of the West, an anti-EU stance, and conspiracy theories involving the so-called Great Replacement, anti-vaccination movement, and hostility to globalised elites, “neo-Marxism”, and feminism.

If many conspiracists are former or failed politicians, they nevertheless represent anti-system positions that have helped them succeed in getting close to a parliamentary party (SPD) and gain political leverage, i.e. in the Supervisory Board of public media. Also, unlike last year, President Miloš Zeman accepted to endorse the meeting.53 They, thus, represent the far-right part of the political scene intent to copy European populist radical right such as the AfD and Lega Nord.

A look at anti-Islam literature in the Czech Republic presents a similar picture of broadening agendas. Until recently, there was one dedicated anti-Islam resource centre: the multilingual Internet platform Centre for Research of Political Islam (CSPI), which propagates the books of the American anti-Islam activist Bill Warner.54 The CSPI is a registered non-profit organisation in the Czech Republic and has a Czech director, but publishes in all Eastern European languages. Recently, the ex-Muslim convert and current anti-Islam publicist Lukáš Lhoťan created a local resource centre: an e-shop that sells all available Czech and Slovak anti-Islam literature, from Lhoťan’s and Konvička’s works to those of Bill Warner.55 Besides, Lhoťan’s e-shop also sells foreign books translated into Czech: Michel Houellebecq’s Soumission (Submission), Renaud Camus’s The Great Replacement, Richard B. Spencer’s Blogging the Qur’an. He also sells books by Petr Hampl (The Road from Serfdom) and Jan Keller, a renowned sociologist and former MEP who has embraced far-right views on Islam and Europe. Hence, not only is there a market for anti-Islam publications, but anti-Islam has been incorporated into a larger illiberal train of thought.

Concerning violent-prone far-right groups, the Ministry of Interior report on extremism in 2019 concluded that all three existing paramilitary groups – aiming to “defend Czech traditional values against migrants and Muslims” – were rather small and stagnant structures. While their online presence is quite substantial, their members are estimated at some 200 people, mostly retired men, and their membership is in decline.56

There are several long-term initiatives that specifically aim at countering intolerance. For example, the project Hate Free Culture that was started with the aid of the Czech government and Norwegian funds continued to promote a civilised debate on issues that divide society. Among others, the project’s website shares inspiring stories of Muslims living in the Czech Republic, such as the stories of refugees who have started successful businesses, media projects, etc. Due to the Covid-19 pandemic, Hate Free Culture could not continue public intercultural events. Another initiative, the Scouting Institute planned “intercultural meetings”, including several dedicated to Islam. The cultural festivals “Half-Moon above Prague” and “Arabfest” in Plzeň regularly present Islam-related themes. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs organises a public conference on intercultural and interfaith dialogue annually; the conference is organised in collaboration with the Organisation of the Islamic Conference. This year’s edition featured religion’s responses to the pandemic. The student initiative Encyclopaedia of Migration presents facts and analyses of the Muslim world and beyond.

54. https://www.cspii.org/cs/

The Ombudsman’s Office is active in preventing hate speech on the Internet though seminars, leaflets, and work with schools. It was involved in a high-school “Olympics of Human Rights” dealing, among others, with hate speech on the Internet.

The year 2020 saw a decline in Islamophobic activity and the side-lining of the anti-Islam agenda of far-right parties in light of the public health crisis caused by the Covid-19 pandemic. Meanwhile, 2020 also witnessed the unchecked spread of more sophisticated and complex forms of prejudice. Gradually, if slowly, state institutions (police, courts) are tackling anti-Islam prejudice, assisted by an increasingly professional civil society and a growing number of civic initiatives. If outright anti-Islam attacks are less numerous, diffused public animosity against Muslims has not subsided. The negative trend has to do with a broadening of an identitarian, neo-nationalist agenda that combines anti-Islam prejudice with hostility to liberalism, the EU, feminism, etc. The myth of the Great Replacement has been imported from France and diffused itself in the so-called alternative media.

Recommendations:

• To tackle further Internet-based hate speech with youth education and justice reforms.
• To continue to embed Islamophobia within the larger problem of racist activities and not to single it out.
• To continue to develop civic initiatives that foster communication across class, ethnic, regional, and age divides.
• To monitor and understand identitarian and neo-nationalist agendas.
• To involve Muslim communities in public activities.
• To work within EU-wide structures (Amnesty International, ENAR, ODIHR).
• To support female activism of all sorts and to include Muslims.
• To support general knowledge and acquaintance with Islam and its place in Europe.

Executive Summary

The following report highlights some of the most significant examples and developments of Islamophobia in Denmark in 2020. In many aspects of political, social, public, and religious life, Muslims seem to be targeted based on their beliefs and perceived incompatibility with “Danish values”. Islamophobia remains, however, an ill-understood concept within Danish society. Politicians, media, and the public continue to resist the need to address Islamophobia as a type of racism targeting Muslims and people assumed to be Muslim.

Physical and verbal attacks on Muslims continue to be high. As the most targeted religious community, Muslims experienced 45% of all religiously motivated hate crimes in 2020. Recent studies in employment demonstrate that Muslim women are highly disadvantaged compared to white women when applying for jobs despite professional qualifications. Still, politicians claim that Muslim women’s higher unemployment rates are due to family control. Although the claim that the family is at fault remains unsubstantiated, the government has implemented nationwide campaigns on this issue, neglecting the discrimination Muslim women experience in the job market.

Since the current government was elected in 2019, it has sought to ban state funding for Muslim faith-based schools. The only thing stopping the government from implementing such a ban is the Danish Constitution, which prevents discrimination based on religion or ethnicity. In 2020, however, the Justice Ministry ruled it would not be a breach of the constitution to implement a ban of funding for Muslim schools without further explanation.

Political rhetoric in 2020 focused particularly on Muslims’ personal, social, and religious freedoms in everyday life. The rhetoric was not always blatantly bigoted in limiting Muslims’ civil rights. Instead, it was often hidden behind a veneer of liberation rhetoric attempting to ‘save’ Muslim youth, particularly young Muslim women, from a perceived inherent psychological violence of Muslim men and Muslim religious communities.

Along this trend in political rhetoric, a number of new laws were introduced to control and surveil Muslim faith communities, e.g. requiring religious sermons in Danish and attempting to ban state funding for Muslim schools.

This report gives an indication of the trends in 2020 and where Denmark is heading in relation to protecting the rights of minority groups and freedoms.
Sammenfatning

Fysiske og verbale angreb på muslimer er fortsat højt, og som det mest udsatte trossamfund, oplevede de 45% af alle registrerede religiøst motiverede hadforbrydelser i 2020. Nyere undersøgelser viser, at muslimeske kvinder er dårligere stillet i forhold til hvide danske kvinder, når de søger job. Alligevel hævder politikere, at muslimske kvinners højere arbejdsløshed skyldes ’negativ social kontrol’ af specielt mandlige familiedeler, der nægter at lade disse kvinder arbejde. Selvom disse påstande ikke er underbyggede, har regeringen gennemført landsdækkende kampagner om emnet, der fremmer denne forestilling, samtidig forøger de kvindernes oplevelser af racisme og diskrimination på arbejdsmarkedet.

Den politiske retorik i 2020 har især fokuseret på muslimers personlige, sociale og religiøse friheder som udtrykt i hverdagslivet. Den islamofobiske retorik er ikke nødvendigvis åbenlys fordomsfuld med henblik på at begrænse muslimes rettigheder, men i stedet skjult bag en frigørelseretorik, der forsøger at “rede” muslemske unge, især unge muslimeske kvinder, fra en forestillet psykologisk vold fra muslimeske mænd og deres religiøse samfund. Som resultat, er der blevet indført en række nye love til at kontrollere og overvåge muslimeske borgere og deres trossamfund, ved f.eks. at påkrev religiøse prædikener på dansk eller forsøget på at forbyde statsfinansiering til muslimeske friskoler.

Denne rapport er langt fra en dybdegående gennemgang af islamofobi i Danmark og hvordan den hænger sammen med andre typer af racisme, men den giver en indikation af hvilke tendenser, der har været i 2020, og hvor Danmark er på vej hen i forhold til at værne om minoritetsgruppers rettigheder og friheder.

Far-Right Militant Organisations: N/A

Limitations to Islamic Practices

- Hijab Ban: No. The parliament rejected a bill-proposal to ban public servants from wearing religious symbols in December 2020.
- Halal Slaughter Ban: No, although there is a ban on slaughtering a non-stunned animal, which to some Muslims is a crucial part of halal slaughter.
- Minaret Ban: No
- Circumcision Ban: A bill-proposal to ban circumcision has been proposed but not yet put forward for a vote in parliament.
- Burka Ban: Yes, the ban on covering one’s face is still in effect despite the requirements of face masks on public transportation and shops to protect against the COVID-19 pandemic.
- Prayer Ban: No
Introduction

In February 2020, the Danish Parliament voted for a common statement agreeing that “[t]he Parliament condemns anti-Semitism in any form and has noted with concern that anti-Semitism is not only growing in neo-Nazi but also in Islamic circles.”¹ Later, the word “Islamic” was corrected to “Islamist”.² The statement came as a response to the vandalisation of Jewish tombstones at a cemetery committed by members of the far-right organisation Nordic Resistance Movement (Nordisk Modstandsbevægelse). When questioned on the matter, none of the political parties (across the political spectrum) who voted in favour of the statement nor the Justice Minister could offer substantial proof that anti-Semitism is rising among Islamists—a categorisation of Muslims the government has yet to define.³ The unsubstantiated claim vilifying Muslims as particularly anti-Semitic, which was supported by traditionally left-leaning parties, is a small example of how Muslims have been increasingly targeted – often with little or no substance.

Late in November 2020, this tendency culminated with the Parliament passing the following statement: “The Parliament believes that it is very worrying that Islamist forces are trying to turn Muslim citizens against Denmark and thereby divide our society. The Parliament considers it crucial to get rid of extreme Islamism and the challenges associated with it, in order to safeguard the cohesion and democracy in Denmark”. This statement, which speaks to a moral panic in its lack of a clear definition of ‘Islamist forces’, was voted in favor by all left-center parties with the exception of independent MPs.⁴

The American Black Lives Matter movement sparked a global awareness of racism and inspired a similar momentum in Denmark—including Islamophobia as a form of racism. Nevertheless, it seems the Danish government has been indifferent to the grassroots mobilisation that seeks to challenge its discriminatory policies aimed at ‘non-Western immigrants and descendants’ (official state category), oft racialised to Muslims in the public imaginary.

This report is not an exhaustive overview of Islamophobia in Denmark in 2020. Rather, it is a brief insight into how Islamophobia has developed and gained further prominence within political structures, media discourse, and everyday life.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

Out of 635 registered cases of hate crimes, the National Police of Denmark documents that there has been an increase of 12% of all registered cases from 2019 to 2020. As reported in the EIR 2019, the police launched an awareness campaign titled “Stop the Hate” urging minority communities to report experiences of hate crime. As the numbers indicate, this campaign may have had a positive effect on the reporting of hate crimes. The majority of hate crime cases were racially motivated (360 cases) followed by religiously motivated hate crimes (194 cases). For the sake of this Islamophobia report, I will focus on the religiously motivated hate crimes; however, I do not dismiss the fact that black and brown people in Denmark are often racialised as Muslims in the public’s perception. In other words, many racially motivated hate crimes could potentially also be Islamophobic in intent but were never registered as such.

Out of the 194 cases of religiously motivated hate crimes around 45% were directed at Muslims, demonstrating that Muslims bear the brunt of religiously motivated hate crimes followed by the Jewish population (41%). The police report explains that Muslims are the largest religious minority group, which is why they expect more reports from Muslim citizens. This conclusion seems problematic as it assumes that because Muslims are the largest religious minority, they will report more hate crimes. It is true that Muslims make up more people in terms of numbers, but statistically speaking, the percentage of reported hate crimes is still higher for Muslims than any other religious minority group; Muslims being a larger group does not affect that number. There was however a 12% decrease in Islamophobic hate crimes in 2020 from 61% in 2019. The explanation for this might be that the police reported a surge in Islamophobic hate crimes in 2019, especially online, immediately following the terrorist attacks in Christchurch, New Zealand.

Unfortunately, the yearly hate crime report does not provide information on the gender and age of the victims of the attacks, but based on a literature review of news media articles, it seems that visibly Muslim women are more vulnerable to physical and verbal attacks. For instance, Women in Dialogue, a collective of Muslim women who wear the niqab, have raised awareness over the physical and verbal harassment they experience in public spaces. In April 2020, a woman wearing the niqab on the train was harassed by a fellow passenger who photographed her (and later publicised her picture on social media) and called the police. The woman received a ticket for wearing the niqab, while the police questioned the man whether he said anything racist to the woman. Unsurprisingly, the man confirmed he had not said anything racist and was allowed to leave. This is an important incident to unpack. First, the incident took place after the COVID-19 pandemic began, and the woman wore her niqab according to the guidelines for face masks on public transport, whereby one is permitted to wear a piece of fabric instead of a medical mask. Despite COVID-19 measures, the police were fining women for covering their face in public outside of these spaces. Second, the harassment could not be reported as a hate crime, because the man insisted, he was reporting a “crime” according to Danish law. However, COVID-19 regulations have highlighted the intended targeting of Muslim women in the prohibition of face coverings in Danish law, which was implemented in 2018. The parliament had to phrase the niqab-bill without any direct reference to Muslim women to avoid transgressing the Danish constitution. Yet, in a context where the pandemic regulations require face coverings in public transport and other public places, the law relies on the police’s ability to understand the spirit of the law, producing an overtly racist differentiation between Muslim women wearing niqab and those wearing a face mask solely for medical purposes. This means that a woman wearing a niqab rather than a face mask can be charged with a fine of DKK 1,000 (EUR 135), which increases up to DKK 10,000 (EUR 1,000) for repeat offenders, while still being required to wear a mask even if she were to take off her niqab.

Despite the heightened awareness of the police to register and compile statistics on hate crime – physical, verbal, and online – it seems that it can still be a complicated process. The project manager at Centre for Muslims’ Rights in Denmark (CEDA) describes reporting a flyer found in a residential neighbourhood with a large number of minorities that encourages coughing on a minority. This flyer was found at the height of the COVID-19 outbreak indicating that people cough on minorities and infect or at least scare them to believe they’ve been infected with the corona virus. After evaluating the complaint, the state prosecutor decided not to proceed with any charges because they could not figure out who made and distributed the flyer or what ‘Coronawaffen Division’ refers to. In addition, the prosecutor gave the following explanation:

I have further emphasised that even if the originator of the flyer could be found, the content of the flyer does not, after full sufficient certainty, fulfill the content of the offense in section 266b of the Criminal Code. Thus, notwithstanding that the content of the flyer may appear offensive, it cannot be established that the flyer expresses a threat, insult or humiliation of a group of persons on the basis of race, color, national or ethnic origin, religion or sexual orientation within the meaning of the provision.9

Even though the prosecutor did not view the flyer as a threat against minorities, the police did contact CEDAR’s project manager five months after the initial report and reassured her that the complaint had been taken seriously and filed as a hate crime. This reveals how the determination of hate crimes is a rather bureaucratic process which relies heavily on the person interpreting the incident. In this case, the state prosecutor and the national police seemed to differ on their views of the flyer.

It is not difficult then to understand a Muslim’s reluctance to contact the police whenever they experience discrimination (Islamophobic or otherwise), as noted previously. According to a documentary questioning the fairness of hate crime laws in Denmark and the difficulties in reporting physical and verbal attacks as a hate crime, people have little faith in the police handling these cases, since the benefit of the doubt is often given to the assailer when proving their attack was not motivated by hate. Likewise, the focus of the “Stop the Hate” police campaign was solely to encourage victims of hate crime to report these crimes to the police; it completely neglected the problematic elements within hate crime’s legal framework which privileges the assailer’s motivations for physically and/or verbally abusing a minority. This means that racist verbal utterances need to be proved as the sole motivator for the abuse with no other motivations prior to the abuse.11

Employment

According to a recent study by the University of Copenhagen, minority ethnic women need to send 18% more applications compared to white women, while women who wear the hijab need to send 60% more applications compared to white women to get shortlisted for a job interview. According to the Institute for Human Rights, these research findings are important information as they attest to how Muslim and ethnic minority women are excluded from the workforce, despite being highly educated. According to one study referenced in an article by the institute, there has been a 21% increase in minority ethnic women obtaining professional degrees between 2008 and 2019. Yet, minority ethnic women with professional degrees are 12% more likely to be unemployed – a figure that is twice the number of white women. One of the reasons for this discrepancy, the report concludes, is the fact that women wearing the hijab may experience discrimination by employers when there is no other valid reason to be found (private companies are allowed to refuse to hire women wearing the hijab based on company policies on secularism)12. This is the first time that a quantitative study has looked into experiences of racial and Islamophobic discrimination on the job market. The stark numbers indicate that it is not merely a question of suitability and professional competence but implies actual discrimination against Muslim and/or minority ethnic women. The lead researcher on the project, Malte Dahl, explains that the results challenge the Danish labour market ideal, which is built on meritocratic principles (education, experience, competence, etc.), and indicates there are financial implications when excluding Muslim women from the labour market by employers13.

A newly published research project by economists at the University of Copenhagen highlights how, amongst 56,000 surveyed households, the majority of these would prefer to hire domestic help by “Anders” rather than “Ali”.14 This is an important indication of the unconscious bias that Muslim jobseekers in general have to deal with when applying for jobs. This research is another indicator of the challenges that Muslims face when applying for jobs, apprenticeships, and placements. There is little impetus to address these patterns of employment bias both in the private and public sector. Danish hiring policies often lag behind in ensuring equal opportunities for minorities; they often simply add a generalised standard statement of “we encourage anyone of any ethnic, religious or gender background to apply”. However, with no apparent objective to be more inclusive in the workforce, these statements are mere performances that do not address the challenges of being shortlisted for a position, let alone being hired, with a non-Western name—especially Muslim.

The two research projects described here are important for understanding the challenges minorities face in gaining access to the job market. Nevertheless, in order to meet the challenges of racism in hiring processes, such research must be followed by clear policies from the government to address employer’s unconscious bias when refusing to hire non-Western employees, and particularly Muslim women.

Education

Following up on last year’s EIR report, which highlighted how the government was putting increased surveillance on Muslim faith-based schools based on the number of ‘non-Western’ students they have enrolled, it seems the government is now working towards a total ban of state funding for Muslim schools (as opposed to the general entitlement of all faith-based or alternative schools). This could essentially amount to the closure of Muslim schools altogether—indeed the ban was an election pledge by the current government, the Social Democrats. But the Danish constitution—paragraph 70 which reads that no one’s rights and freedoms can be violated because of their religious beliefs or ethnic origin—had previously prevented the government from directly banning all funding for Muslim schools.

Yet in the fall of 2020, the justice ministry remarkably declared that banning state funding for Muslim schools (24 schools in total) cannot be understood as a violation of Danish constitution. The justice ministry did not justify their reasoning and there remain disagreements among Danish jurists how the ministry came to this new interpretation of paragraph 70. Jurists critical of the justice ministry’s declaration argue that, regardless how the bill is phrased, the government has explicitly admitted it is targeting Muslim schools by focusing on the number of non-Western pupils a school has enrolled—basically targeting religious schools by proxy of students’ ethnic origins.

Although the justice ministry has changed its interpretation of the constitution in this regard, the majority of parties, including the opposition Venstre, seem unwilling to transgress neither the Danish Constitution nor international human rights conventions in their efforts to ban Muslim schools. The Social Democrats, however, promise to find a ‘technical’ solution to address these concerns, stating they will hold off on presenting a bill this year. It seems to be merely a matter of time before they manage to formulate a bill that will appease the concerns of constitutional and human rights lawyers. It is important to mention that in spite of the debate on withdrawing all funding for Muslim schools, none of the opposition is highlighting the explicit Islamophobia in wanting to ban these schools. Their objection is not about discriminating against Muslims per se—it is an internal hesitancy as to how far the boundaries of rights can be moved.

The ombudsman has looked into the government’s increased investigation and its withdrawal of funding for Muslim schools, which resulted in their closure. For the past three years, the increased scrutiny has resulted in the closure of three primary schools and two boarding schools—all with a Muslim ethos. In two of these five cases, the schools have raised a complaint to the ombudsman who will investigate decision of the Danish Agency for Education and Quality (STUK). Lawyers and the Danish Free School Association highlight that the increased surveillance of Muslim schools is politicised and lacks legal certainty. One of the issues with the increased surveillance is that it is not based on the schools’ performances or objective criteria but rather on the agency’s own assessments. According to one lawyer, the schools have no way of addressing the issues raised by STUK as its only course of action has been to immediately withdraw funding with no recourse for correction. This leaves the schools in a legally precarious position with their futures depending completely on STUK’s elusive appraisals, rather than actual school performances.17

While the government’s targeting of Muslim schools is deeply concerning, it is made worse when Muslims also face barriers in accessing public schools. A recent study by political scientists at the University of Copenhagen surveyed all public primary schools in Denmark (1,698 in total), investigating discrepancies in school transfers of students with Danish names and Muslim-sounding names.18 They found Danish students had a 25% success rate in public school transfers, while Muslim students only had 15%. The study also highlighted that Muslim parents must navigate additional administrative demands when transferring schools, compared to their non-Muslim counterparts.

Politics

On her Facebook page, the Danish Prime Minister Mette Frederiksen responded to the terrorist attacks in France and Austria by claiming that “Islamic terror has hit us Europeans again [...].”19 With no recognition of the conflation between Islam and terror in her statement, Frederiksen inadvertently affirmed the racialised division between “us Europeans” and Muslims.

In another instance on her Facebook page, Frederiksen exclaimed, “Sharia doesn’t belong in Denmark”.20 This was a response to learning about an imam consulting and negotiating a divorce agreement between a couple. The incident was reported in Berlingske with only fragments of the agreement translated from Arabic to Danish; the case launched politicians into a frenzy, vilifying imams and Muslim men as the primary offenders towards Muslim women’s rights in marriage and divorce cases.21 In response, the government promised to introduce harsher policies to deal with what they call “negative social control” – i.e. Muslim families who restrict the social activities of young women (friendships, romantic relationships, etc.).22

In 2020, scholars at Roskilde University published a state commissioned report on minority ethnic women’s experience of male/family social control. The report, “Power and inequality/possibility: Negotiations of conformity, authority and mobility amongst ethnic minority citizens in Denmark”, took a critical position on the government’s understanding of needing more surveillance of Muslim communities to address ‘social control’. Instead, the report offered a more complex and nuanced analysis of how young resourceful Muslim women negotiate and challenge familial and cultural expectations based on their religious beliefs as well as a description of their experiences with increased discrimination from the broader society.23 In this regard, as a surprising infringement on academic freedom, the Minister of Immigration and Integration Mattias Tesfaye, removed the report from the ministry’s website. 24 Tesfaye explained that although it is very unusual to censor a commissioned academic report from the government’s website, he argued that he did not want the Danish public to mistake the report’s findings for the ministry’s opinion.” 25

The complete rejection of the report by the Ministry of Immigration and Integration raises questions of academic freedoms, including the ability to introduce critical assessments in state-commissioned reports. Several law professors have questioned the ability to remove a government commissioned report from the Ministry’s website that was deemed academically sound. They have indicated that this was a political decision rather than one based on an objective evaluation of the report’s content. It seems the government sought to direct research rather than allowing research to direct policy. 26 What is especially problematic about this reaction from the ministry is how revealing it is of restrictions on academics to criticise government policies, especially those which seek to increase control and surveillance of Muslim citizens and their lifestyles.

Ironically, not long before the Integration Minister censored the abovementioned report, the Ministry of Justice launched a new state commissioned report on freedom of speech. The report concluded that 76% of immigrants from Muslim countries want to make criticism of Islam illegal. This led Tesfaye to infer, “Some people have come to Denmark to become part of our prosperity and security, but who do not recognise that it is based on some freedoms, e.g. freedom of speech.” 27

The policies introduced by the Integration Minister seek to surveil and control Muslims’ family and social life so that they adhere to the government’s idea of how citizens should socialise (particularly youth and women). In this regard, Tesfaye has urged Muslim community leaders to endorse premarital sex. 28 He has also targeted the Muslim dowry, which provides the woman a material gift when entering a marriage contract. He calls this a “bazaar deal between two clans”, indicating that Muslim families sell their daughters into marriage. It is important to note that one of the young women who Tesfaye was responding to in an article, clarified her position, explaining that she was not against the concept of dowry. Rather, she was against misusing the concept as a way to receive large sums of money. This is a conversation that has been happening within the Muslim community in Denmark for a while, with religious leaders advising women and their families to ask for modest amounts in dowry as to facilitate marriage among young couples.

In January 2020, 96 families received eviction notices to vacate their social housing as a consequence of the controversial ghetto policies implemented in 2018. Several families sued the homeowners’ association for discriminatory evictions based on the ghetto legislation, which explicitly targets ‘non-Western’ residents. Unfortunately, the municipal courts ruled the evictions lawful, and residents must vacate their homes. Recently, residents in other social housing estates have taken legal action against the government for the same reason: the ghetto legislation deliberately discriminates against ‘non-Western’ residents and leaves its residents in precarious situations. It will be important to follow these legal proceedings in 2021, as residents and grassroots organisations have increasingly mobilised to challenge the government’s implementation of its racist ghetto policy.

Media

Mainstream media often play a vital role in perpetuating Islamophobia by reinforcing the idea – promoted by politicians – of problematic Muslim citizens. Interestingly, the European Islamophobia Report 2019 (EIR) became a discussion item in one of the largest Danish newspapers, Berlingske. These reactions are worthy summarising, given how revealing they are of how Islamophobia in the media operates as a way of silencing Muslims’ experiences of racism. In covering the launch of the report in the summer 2020, Berlingske presented the Danish chapter, which I authored, as a project by a think tank with close ties to the Turkish government. It insinuated that I was collaborating with the Turkish government to make Denmark and its government appear Islamophobic. The journalist managed to get a response from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Jeppe Kofod, who expressed anger over the report and wanted funding for the EIR investigated.\footnote{Christian Birk, “Radikal toppolitiker hænges ud i ny rapport om islamofobi fra Tyrkiet. Udenrigsministeren er ’oppe i det røde felt’”, Berlingske, 3 August 2020 https://www.berlingske.dk/danmark/radikal-toppolitiker-haenges-ud-i-ny-rapport-om-islamofobi-fra-tyrkiet (Access date: 2 December 2020).}

This harsh response by Berlingske is a repetition of how the newspaper targeted the authors of the 2018 report on Islamophobia in Denmark and demonstrates the powerful position mainstream media have in de-platforming Muslim voices and concerns of Islamophobia – a topic that is neglected and dismissed because it is often perceived to cull criticism of Islam. Muslims’ critiques of discrimination are reserved to opinion pieces and are rarely given space to be debated within mainstream media. In the coverage of the 2019 EIR report, the journalists reached out to me for a comment, but the focus was geared towards the accusation of conspiring with the Turkish government – an insinuation I refused to entertain, demanding that the conversation should be on the topic of Islamophobia in Denmark and not geopolitical issues between Denmark and Turkey.

The government is proposing a bill that will enforce the use of the Danish language as a prerequisite in all religious sermons, whether in the form of simultaneous translation or a follow-up translation. The government does not single out Muslims in the proposed bill because that would be unconstitutional. Nevertheless, the government has made it clear to the public that the intended target is the Muslim community and what they perceive to be a threat of radicalisation within mosques.\footnote{Maja Hagedorn Hansen, “Regeringen vil have prædikener og forkyndelse på dansk: ’Vores hensigt er at undgå parallelsamfund’”, Altinget, 12 October 2020, https://www.altinget.dk/artikel/regeringen-vil-have-praedikener-er-og-forkyndelse-paa-dansk-vores-hensigt-er-at-undgaa-parallelsamfund?fbclid=IwAR3UZC9r58EsDxthcSDhDjJISOLPyZza8h6S1eneouBk-qj7MnNrj1V99Z0 (Access date: 2 December 2020).}
representative MP of the Faroe Islands – a self-governing archipelago that is part of Denmark (with a similar colonial history as Greenland) – asked whether this bill would be extended to the islands. Frederiksen explained Islamism is the target of the bill. She added that Denmark historically never had problems with religions from outside, but is only now experiencing problems with Islamism and Islamists, which is why the government deems it necessary to enforce language demands over religious sermons (negating the years of stark anti-Semitism that was rife in Denmark pre-WW2).

The importance of this exchange is crucial to understand the dynamics of how Islamophobia plays out in Danish political discourse. The bill was introduced in a colour-blind veneer, hiding the political intent in requesting religious communities to conduct sermons in Danish. Only when the Faroe Islands MP questioned Frederiksen in parliament, did she reveal that the intent of the bill is to manage Muslim citizens’ religious practices. However, it would be a breach of the Danish Constitution to create a bill that directly discriminates against the Muslim faith community. Although in this exchange Frederiksen uses the words “Islamism” and “Islamist”, these are elusive concepts that she has made no effort in differentiating from conventional Islamic practices. In fact, on her Facebook page, she described the terror attacks in France as Islamic terror, thus describing Islam as terrorism’s source.

The Ministry of Immigration and Integration has proposed a bill to address what the government calls ‘negative social control and honour-related violence’, its offenders to be sentenced up to three years in prison. Amongst the examples of ‘social control’, the minister wants to include religious leaders advising or negotiating divorce agreements; religious leaders conducting religious marriage ceremonies of minors (it is already illegal to get a civil marriage as a minor). The bill will allow the government jurisdiction to take the passports of minors if parents are suspected to want to travel abroad with their child to force marriage, and it will enable the possibility of deporting any religious leader or parent found guilty of such charges. The bill was accompanied with a larger national campaign to increase attention to Muslim women’s victimhood to their families’ social control (i.e., control over their social, romantic, and even professional lives).

In 2014, Said Mansoor was convicted, stripped of his Danish citizenship, and deported to Morocco for inciting terror on Facebook. He was deported in 2019 by the previous government, led by Prime Minister Lars Løkke Rasmussen (Venstre), with the assurance that if he was deported, he would not be given a death sentence pending terrorist charges in Morocco. In October 2020, however, Mansoor’s trial in Morocco found him guilty of terrorism in Casablanca in 2003 and gave him a death sentence. The current Danish government have responded to the criticism of allowing a former citizen to be extradited to a so-called torture state. They claimed that there is a moratorium on the death penalty in Morocco that has been in effect since 1993. Nevertheless, it raises questions whether Denmark is only performatively living up to international treaties of human rights in this case.

Internet

Hate crime committed online is an increasingly worrying phenomenon in Denmark. The police report on hate crimes highlights that 22% (128 cases) of registered hate crimes in 2019 happened online (particularly Facebook). Many of these were Islamophobic in nature; far-right groups and individuals were reported for Islamophobic speech (18 cases) particularly following the Christchurch attacks.

Social media seems to be an important platform for right-wing pundits to promote hate towards Muslims. One example is the leader of the Danish For Frihed (For Freedom, formerly known as Pegida) who posted a picture of a young Muslim in niqab, describing how he called the police on her and ensured she was fined for covering her face. It is interesting to note how the man in the background in the picture is also covering his face because of the requirement in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic of wearing a mask in public transport.47

!Picture of woman wearing a niqab in a train, photographed by the leader of For Frihed who reported her to the police and shared this picture on his Facebook page.

This illustration demonstrates how bills targeting Muslims allow for the proliferation of hate crimes both in public space and online. For Frihed is an organisation known especially for harassing Muslims, and the niqab ban gave them the formal legitimacy in the guise of upholding the law.

During the Danish lockdown, as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, the intercultural/interreligious organisation Brobyggerne (Bridge Builders) organised an online Ramadan dinner, “RamaDanmark”, with 300 participants, including imams, rabbis, priests, artists, and politicians. The inclusive and celebratory dinner was in-interrupted by Generation Identitær who had encouraged their members and supporters to take action against the event, interrupting speeches with signs saying “Stop Islamisation”. The online event was then disrupted by a hacker posting child pornography. Generation Identitær only admits to interrupting the dinner with posters and denies any involvement in posting the pornographic video, which was reported to the police. This horrific incident demonstrates how even peaceful and inclusive events are targeted with both hate speech and deeply offensive and criminal disruptions.

There were several cases of racial violence that received increased attention amongst the Danish public. The focus on Black Lives Matter over the summer and a rising interest in anti-racism has given a momentum to highlight these issues within the Danish context, including Islamophobia and how it intersects with anti-black and xenophobic racism.

While Rasmus Paludan enjoys the freedom to vocally abuse Muslims in Denmark, several other European countries have restricted his entry. He was ruled a threat to national security and order in Sweden and France, where he wanted to join demonstrations. He was refused entry in Sweden for two years in violation of police orders. Furthermore, he was arrested in France for wanting to burn the Quran in front of the Arc de Triomphe in Paris.

Tommy Robinson, the British pundit convicted of racism and violence, and who founded the EDL, was given a Danish award by Trykkefrihedselsskabet (The Free Press Society), an organisation whose objective is to defend freedom of speech, but often do this by targeting Islam and Muslims. They explained that they were giving him the award for his ‘fight for freedom of speech’. Robinson’s violence and problematic character is well-known in the British context, yet in Denmark he is heralded for his very blatant racism (especially towards Muslims) as a proponent of free speech. It goes to demonstrate the challenges minorities experience in Denmark, where someone can racially abuse you in the guise of freedom of speech. Trykkefrihedselsskabet defended their decision, explaining: “We do not give him the freedom of expression award for the sentences he has received. We do not reward him for that. We reward him for the work he has done in the service of free speech”.53

The far right seems to be becoming increasingly prominent in Denmark with organisations like Generation Identitær protesting against Muslims.54 One can be concerned that although there are a few far-right organisations, there are many individuals who remain unknown and unnoticed by the public. One extreme example is a 31-year-old man who attempted to manufacture weapons and a bomb in his home. Based on the pictures on the walls, the police suspect he had ties with the Nordic Resistance Movement (Nordisk Modstandsbevægelse). The man was found guilty of illegally manufacturing weapons, but the courts ruled there was no evidence that he had the intention use the bomb. He is now serving a 3-year sentence.55 It is interesting to note that the man was not accused of wanting to commit terror as the prosecution doubted that they could gather evidence that he had the intention to destabilise Danish society with his action – a requirement for charges of terrorism.56 The benefit of the doubt given to the accused—who was found in his home with home-manufactured bomb—is stark in comparison to previous terror cases in Denmark, where Muslim men have been charged and convicted of terror offences based on much weaker evidence.57

Civil society’s attention and response to combatting Islamophobia seems to have increased in 2020, especially in light of the general attention the public has given racism over the summer of 2020. Not only have mosques and Muslim organisations become more attuned to calling out and understanding how Islamophobia is played out in the Danish context, but some public figures have become more aware of political and populist discrimination faced particularly by Muslim citizens.58 One umbrella organisation for mosques, the Muslim Council (Muslimernes Fællesråd) has decided to dedicate its work to address Muslims’ experiences of discrimination.\(^5^9\) The Centre for Muslims’ Rights in Denmark (CEDA) has collaborated with 10 NGOs on a report to the UN Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) as well as the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) to highlight issues of racism and discrimination by minority groups in Denmark.\(^6^0\)

Opposing media and political outcry, the National School Songbook Committee included a song by the artist Isam B titled “Ramadan in Copenhagen” (Ramadan i København).\(^6^1\) Right-wing critics argued that the song has no place in the songbook, which is seen as a national cultural treasure. Nevertheless, the committee decided to include the song because it added a localised way of experiencing Ramadan as Danish Muslims.\(^6^2\)

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

This report has demonstrated how Islamophobia continues to worsen in Denmark, both explicitly and implicitly directed at Muslim citizens and people imagined to be Muslim (i.e., non-Western immigrants and descendants).

Hate crime towards Muslims remains high, including physical, verbal, and online abuse. Recent studies in employment demonstrate that employees who appear to be Muslim are disadvantaged when applying for jobs. Meanwhile, politicians claim that Muslim women’s higher unemployment rates are due to family control. Although these claims are refuted by academic research, the government has implemented nationwide campaigns on the issue.

The government seems to be one step closer to banning state funding of Muslim faith-based schools with the Ministry of Justice ruling that it would not be a breach of the Danish Constitution to do so. Concerns from the political opposition, Venstre, is that it may transgress international human rights treaties.

Political rhetoric against Muslims seems to particularly target Muslims’ personal, social, and religious freedoms when it comes to everyday life. The rhetoric is not necessarily blatantly illiberal in limiting Muslims’ civil rights, but instead is hidden behind a veneer of liberal rhetoric attempting to ‘save’ Muslim youth, and particularly young Muslim women, from the perceived inherent psychological violence of Muslim men and Muslim religious communities.

Along this trend in political rhetoric, a number of new laws have been introduced to control and surveil Muslim faith communities, e.g., requiring sermons in Danish and criminalising imams counselling their congregation on personal matters such as divorce agreements.

Based on the observations noted in this report, the following are policy recommendations geared towards politicians, Muslim institutions, anti-racist NGOs, and the general public in Denmark.

• Public and political recognition of Islamophobia as a type of racism targeting Muslims and people perceived to be Muslim.
• Governmental commitment to condemn Islamophobia and anti-Muslim hatred.
• Incorporation of the UN human rights conventions into Danish legislation to ensure that the Danish government adheres to these, in particular the “International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination” and “International Convention on Civil and Political Rights”, and “International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights”.
• Government commitment to create a wide strategy to tackle racism and inequalities faced by all ethnic, racial, and religious minorities, including Muslims.
• Development of a politically independent equality department to oversee and ensure that all new legislation does not target and discriminate against ethnic, racial, and religious minorities in cause or effect.
• Investment in appropriate resources to tackle hate crime effectively and reassess whether hate crime legislation is fit for purpose to address the harm caused by racial, ethnic, and religious discriminatory abuse, especially when the claim behind the abuse is not racially motivated.
• Investment in resources for producing research which explores different aspects and experiences of racism, and more specifically, Islamophobia as a type of racism, from structural and political forms to everyday microaggressions.
• Increase efforts to develop wider anti-racist collaborations with civil society organisations as well as individuals working to tackle both structural and everyday forms of racism affecting minority citizens.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

In 2020, three Islamophobic hate crimes committed by one perpetrator were reported to the police in Estonia. A masked man dropped pig heads at the door of the Islamic Centre in Tallinn, the Embassy of Turkey, and the Embassy of Azerbaijan. The police identified the perpetrator and initiated misdemeanour proceedings for incitement to hatred.

In the political discourse, Islamophobia was not prominent in 2020. However, the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia (EKRE), which became part of the ruling coalition after the elections in 2019, continued to spread Islamophobic stereotypes in the context of their anti-immigration platform.

In the media, Islamophobic content was present in opinion pieces and interviews by the members of the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia. Apart from these, there were a few opinion stories on issues related to Islam from authors presenting different views.

There were no specifically Islamophobic laws or regulations introduced in 2020. However, when justifying legal amendments concerning foreign students, the Minister of the Interior, Mart Helme, stated that more restrictions need to be put in place to protect to public order and national security, particularly outlining Muslims wishing to build mosques in Estonia as a source of threat. The Estonian Internal Security Service also expressed the opinion that the laws, which make it easier for foreigners to work and study in Estonia, are a threat to national security.

In October 2020, the European Commission initiated an infringement procedure against Estonia, since the Estonian Penal Code does not adequately ensure that perpetrators are held accountable for hate speech and hate crimes against minority groups, including Muslims.
Kokkuvõte

Meedias oli islamofoobne sisu nähtav EKRE liikmete arvamuslugudes ja intervjuudes. Lisaks avaldati islamiga seotud teemadel paar arvamuslugu teistelt autoritelt, kes esindasid erinevaid vaateid.

2020. aasta oktoobris alustas Euroopa Komisjon Eesti vastu rikkumismenetlust, kuna Eesti ei ole endiselt nõuetekohaselt kriminalieerinud vaenukõne ja vaenukuritegusid erinevate vähemusgruppide, sealhulgas moslemite vastu.

Introduction

Estonia has a relatively small Muslim population, although it is difficult to estimate its exact size. During the last national census in 2011, 1,508 people in Estonia identified as Muslims. However, it is estimated that the actual number is somewhere between 1,500 and 10,000.¹

Historically, Islam reached Estonia through the Tatars. During the Soviet period, all religions were for the most part eradicated, as is characteristic of the communist worldview. However, in 1989, the re-establishment of the Estonian Islamic Congregation began. At present, the Estonian Islamic Congregation consists mainly of the Tatar, Azerbaijani, Kazakh, and Uzbek communities living in Estonia.² It has been noted that there has been a surge in the growth of the Islamic community in 2016–2017, explained by the addition of immigrants and refugees.³

Most Muslims living in Estonia reside in or near the capital Tallinn. In Tallinn, there is the Estonian Islamic Centre, where Friday prayers, gatherings, lectures, and other events take place. The joint activities in the building are organised by members of the Estonian Islamic Centre or the Estonian Islamic Congregation, as well as other active representatives of the Muslim community in Estonia.⁴

Physical and Verbal Attacks

On 25 October 2020, a masked man dropped pig heads at the door of the Islamic Centre in Tallinn, the Embassy of Turkey, and the Embassy of Azerbaijan. The perpetrator stated that the pig heads were thrown in front of the embassies to “draw attention to the jihad by Azerbaijan and Turkey against the Armenians”. Both of the pig heads included incisions, one of them spelling “Islam” and the other “Muhammad”. With the pig head thrown in front of the Islamic Centre, the man claimed to express his opinion about the fact that Muslims have not condemned certain verses in the Qur’an that “humiliate Jews and Christians and call for violence against them”. He contacted different media outlets to announce that if the embassies and the Islamic Centre do not condemn Muhammad and the said verses in the Qur’an within ten days, more pig heads will be delivered.⁵

⁴ Ibid., p. 9.
The day after, on 26 October 2020, the police reported that they had identified the perpetrator and initiated misdemeanour proceedings on the basis of a provision that focuses on incitement to hatred. The police added that the exact charges will be determined during the proceedings. Provision §151 of the Penal Code states that “activities which publicly incite to hatred, violence or discrimination on the basis of nationality, race, colour, sex, language, origin, religion, sexual orientation, political opinion, or financial or social status, if this results in danger to the life, health or property of a person, are punishable by a fine of up to three hundred fine units or by detention.”

Employment

No discrimination cases against Muslims or persons perceived as Muslims were reported in the job market, according to the Labour Inspectorate of Estonia and the Gender Equality and Equal Treatment Commissioner.

Education

There have been no reports of Islamophobic content becoming a part of curricula, textbooks, or other educational materials.

Politics

During the period under review, no elections took place in Estonia, so there was less Islamophobia in the public political discourse. Nevertheless, the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia (EKRE), which became part of the ruling coalition after the elections in 2019, continued to promote Islamophobic stereotypes in the context of their anti-immigration platform. For example, on their radio show “Räägime asjast”, Minister of Finance Martin Helme and Minister of the Interior Mart Helme discussed the topic of the “Islamic invasion” of Europe. Mart Helme stated that as a result of high birth rates and immigration, Muslims will eradicate the local Belgians.

Media

stories on issues related to Islam by authors presenting different views. For example, a member of the Estonian Defence League wrote about Islamic extremism, jihad, and martyrdom. The article includes statements such as, “Not building mosques does not restrict the religious freedoms of Muslims, but protects non-Muslim citizens from Islamist policies, as the mosque is governed by Sharia law.” In response, a member of the Estonian Refugee Council wrote an opinion piece presenting a broader view of Muslims and Islam outside the battlefield, condemning the opinion that all Muslims are potential sources of danger because of their faith.

Islamophobic content in the Estonian context can be found in opinion pieces and interviews of members of the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia. For example, the Minister of Interior Mart Helme, who is also the former Head of the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia, in an interview stated that he is worried from a security policy point of view because the Islamic community in Estonia is “becoming more and more aggressive, more and more demanding” as they “want to get their mosques.”

Justice System

There have been no specifically Islamophobic laws or regulations introduced in 2020. However, when justifying the amendments to the Aliens Act (Välismaalaste seadus), aiming to restrict the rules for foreigners to stay, study, and work in Estonia, the Minister of the Interior Mart Helme stated that the current regulation concerning foreign students in Estonia must be changed because it does not sufficiently protect public order and national security. He claimed that the problem is “the previously unrepresented and growing communities of foreign nationals in Estonia, who have a significantly different historical, cultural and religious background”. He added that there is quite a strong pressure to build mosques in Estonia, which would “become centres for radical Islam, where measures are planned that endanger members of society.”

In addition, the Estonian Internal Security Service has outlined the laws that make it easier for foreigners to work and study in Estonia as a threat to national security. Despite recognising that the likelihood of a terrorist attack in Estonia remains as low as it has been in previous years, the Internal Security Service considers Islamic terrorism the biggest source of danger in Estonia today. According to the Internal Security Service, in a few years, the number of people from countries belonging to the “terrorist risk group”, such as India, Nigeria, Pakistan, Bangladesh, and Iran, has increased dramatically in the country. The Internal Security Service finds that as Islamic communities grow stronger in Estonia, this will also increase the interest of conservative and radical Islamic organisations in expanding into Estonia. The latter, according to the Internal Security Service, will be facilitated by the laws that enable foreigners to work and study in Estonia.\textsuperscript{16} Foreign students have previously been outlined in relation to the threats of legal migration in annual reviews of the Internal Security Service.\textsuperscript{17}

Furthermore, the current Estonian legislation still does not provide an effective possibility for prosecuting hate crime and hate speech against Muslims, as well as other groups. The Penal Code includes provision $\S 151$ for “incitement to hatred”, however, since the provision requires the existence of “danger to the life, health or property of a person”, it is not effective in practice. For this reason, in October 2020, the European Commission started an infringement procedure against Estonia. According to the commission, Estonian national laws do not fully and accurately transpose the EU rules on combatting racism and xenophobia by means of criminal law, stressing that Estonia has not correctly criminalised hate speech and has not provided for adequate penalties. In addition, the Estonian Penal Code does not ensure that the bias motivation of crimes is taken into account as an aggravating circumstance so that hate crimes could be effectively and adequately prosecuted.\textsuperscript{18} In response, the Estonian Minister of Justice, Raivo Aeg, stated that freedom of speech and media freedom cannot be attacked, while agreeing to analyse the European Commission’s position.\textsuperscript{19}

There are no websites specifically dedicated to covering topics related to Islam. The main website that regularly spreads Islamophobic stereotypes is the governing Conservative People’s Party of Estonia’s (EKRE) news portal \textit{Uued Uudised} (The New News),\textsuperscript{20} which also has 18,000 followers on its Facebook page.\textsuperscript{21} In 2020, it published around twenty articles in which Islamic themes were covered, promoting the

\bibitem{21} Facebook, https://www.facebook.com/uueduudised/, (Access date: 3 November 2020).
\end{thebibliography} narrative that Islam is taking over Europe and is violent by its nature. Some headlines of these articles include, “Islamist Bioweapon: Two Men Who Deliberately Spread the Virus Were Detained in Tunisia”22; “A Lost Battle against Islamism? How to Win a War against Islamists”23; “Islam Is Embedded in the Already Weak Bundeswehr – Imams, or Potential ‘Holy War’ Preachers, Are Wanted There”.24 Furthermore, Uued Uudised has published numerous anti-immigration articles, one of which claims that Muslims “often prefer to earn a living in a way which is illegal in the West”.25 The portal also raised alarm when Tallinn’s city development strategy included a picture of a woman in a headscarf, demanding to know “when have the voters given a mandate to turn the Estonian capital into a multicultural metropolis”.26

Such articles do not usually transfer to the mainstream media; however, they are actively shared on social media, particularly in far-right supporter groups on Facebook, resulting in hate speech against Muslims in the comments.

In 2020, a new topic that emerged in these Facebook groups was accusing Muslims in other countries of not following the restrictions put in place due to the COVID-19 pandemic. For example, when an article about people ignoring restrictions in Bangladesh was shared in an EKRE supporter group, the comments included degrading and Islamophobic statements such as the notion that these people must be fulfilling Allah’s will to die of the virus.27

The Conservative People’s Party of Estonia (EKRE) and their online news portal Uued Uudised are the central sources of Islamophobic content in Estonia. The website published the following opinion by Jaak Madison, a member of the European Parliament and the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia, in response to the attacks in France: “We have repeatedly seen in Europe in recent years how even these so-called peaceful Muslims are silent when their comrades-in-arms detonate bombs, attack the Christmas markets with lorries or cut off heads with machetes. Islam is not suitable for Europe, and this has been said for years by the ‘evil right-wing extremists’. He added that “decades of politics of tolerance and equality do not work and will not work”. Madison is a member of the far-right group Identity and Democracy (ID) in the European Parliament.

In January 2020, the Ministry of Social Affairs published a series of videos in the framework of the campaign Kõik on erinevad, kuid sama palju inimesed (Everyone is different, but equally human), focusing on stories of school bullying, migrant workers, national minorities, religious beliefs, and people with disabilities. One of the videos depicts a friendship between two boys in kindergarten, one of whom is a Muslim. The videos promote showing kindness and goodwill towards all people. However, the Minister of the Interior, Mart Helme, stated that the campaign depicts a distorted society, claiming the campaign is born of an abnormal way of thinking. The Minister of Finance, Martin Helme, called the campaign “a total provocation”.

In October 2020, the Estonian Refugee Council’s social enterprise Siin & Sääl started a series of cultural events, through which migrants and refugees introduce their countries of origin. The first cultural evening focused on Syria. The Estonian Refugee Council explained that since fear is often caused by what is strange and unknown, the cultural events aim to bring together different communities living in Estonia by introducing their backgrounds so as they get to know each other better.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

In Estonia, Islamophobic attitudes usually arise in the context of immigration, particularly encouraged by the Conservative People’s Party of Estonia, a far-right political party currently in the government. It is therefore complicated to combat these expressions of Islamophobia, since attempts to promote tolerance are met with criticism from politicians in power. A 2019 study demonstrated that there is a link between prejudices and the country’s general immigration policy – countries with a more liberal policy usually have less prejudice among the general population. It is therefore essential to adjust the national immigration policy and stop spreading Islamophobic stereotypes on the national level.

The same study found that the size of the country’s Muslim community reduces prejudices – the larger the community, the less prejudice. Since the Estonian Muslim community is small and most Estonians have never had a personal connection with anyone from a Muslim background, it is important to keep organising events on the local level where communities with different religious and ethnic backgrounds have the opportunity to become acquainted with one another.

In addition, to ensure effective prosecution of incidents of hate speech and hate crime against Muslims and other minority groups, the Estonian Penal Code should be reviewed and necessary amendments should be adopted in order to bring Estonian legislation in line with EU law, and in particular the Council Framework Decision 2008/913/JHA.

Executive Summary

Anti-Muslim racism continues to grow and deepen its roots in Finland. Despite some positive efforts to clamp down on hate speech and ethnic agitation such as outlawing neo-Nazi associations like Pohjoismainen vastarintaliike (PVL) and the conviction in 2018 of the former editor of MV-lehti, an Islamophobic online publication, Islamophobia continues to be the elephant in the room. Some reasons for this predicament are that this racism is still played down and not given enough attention and resources by the authorities. President Sauli Niinistö’s speech during the opening session of parliament in February was encouraging but also a disappointment. He said that Finland should “be resolute in opposing” anti-Semitism and racism but did not mention Islamophobia once. This should not surprise us since Yaron Nadbornik, the president of the 1,100-member-strong Jewish Community of Helsinki, said in an interview that it was only in 2018-2019 when the authorities started to recognize anti-Semitism as a problem.

On top of the suspicion that the Muslim community faces, matters have been made worse and efforts and positive steps have been stymied by the presence of an Islamophobic party, the PS, which has played an important role in the country’s political scene since 2011 when it won 39 seats from 5 seats in the previous parliamentary election. Even if Islam is the second most popular religion in Finland and the first Muslims (Tatars) migrated to the country at the end of the nineteenth century, Muslims continue to be perceived as outsiders whose practices are incompatible with Finland’s way of life. Considering the scant political, economic, and social power that Muslims enjoy, it’s clear that Islamophobia will not recede for the time being but will grow in Finland.
Tiivistelmä

Muslimien epäilyn lisäksi, hallituksen ja viranomaisten positiivia askeleita ovat esitteenä islamofobinen puolue Perussuomalaiset, jolla on ollut näkyvä paikka Suomen poliittikassa vuodesta 2011, jolloin se voitti 39 kansanedustajan paikkaa verrattuna 5 edelliin eduskuntavaaleissa. Vaikka islam on toiseksi suurin uskonto Suomessa ja ensimmäiset muslimit (tataarit) muuttivat maahan jo 1800-luvun lopulla, muslimeja pidetään edelleen ulkopuolisina, joiden tavat ovat ristiriidassa suomalaisen elämän kanssa. Ottaen huomion muslimien oma väähäinen poliittinen, taloudellinen ja sosiaalinen valta, on selvää, ettei islamofobia vielä väisty, vaan edelleen kasvaa Suomessa.

Statistics on Islamophobia: The Police University College of Finland, which publishes suspected hate crime statistics with a one-year lag, reported that hate crimes totaled 899 cases in 2019, which is 1.21% less from 910 cases in the previous year.1 The number of convictions in 2019 was 22 (12 cases for ethnic agitation, 10 cases for assault), but the amount of suspected ethnic agitation cases rose to 105 from 34.2

As in previous years, the lion’s share (87.1%) of suspected cases were due to a person’s ethnic (72.3%) or religious (14.8%) background. In the former case, Somalis suffered the most attacks (37 out of 10,000 people) followed by Turks (33-34 out of 10,000 people) and Iraqis (34 out of 10,000), which was a 50% versus 2018. As in previous years, the majority of hate crimes due to religion targeted Muslims.3 One of the questions that arises from the Police University College hate crime report is the low number of women victims compared with men victims. According to the report,

63% of the cases involved men and 37% women. In countries like France, Muslim women are the most vulnerable, accounting for 81.5% of Islamophobic attacks. The corresponding figure for the Netherlands is over 90%, according to the European Network Against Racism (ENAR).4

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: Some annual hate crime reports such as those by the Police University College, the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, the Council of Europe Commission Against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI), and the Non-Discrimination Ombudsman of Finland have called on Finland to take a tougher stance on hate speech and racism.

Introduction

The government program of Prime Minister Sanna Marin aims to create “a more equal and equitable country where everyone is valuable and where trust in others and society augments.”\(^7\) A positive step in this direction was announced by Green League Minister of the Interior Maria Ohisalo, who stated that one of the aims of the government is to recruit people of different ethnic backgrounds into jobs like the police.\(^8\) Another positive sign was a video published in May by the government with four imams who wished everyone a “Happy Ramadan” with the additional message that social distancing should be observed during the holy month due to the Covid-19 pandemic.\(^9\) There are reportedly government plans in 2021 to do away with the tightening of the immigration act that occurred in 2016,\(^10\) which shortened appeal times for asylum seekers and made family reunification more difficult.

In the face of these positive steps in support of the Muslim community, anti-Muslim racism continues to raise its head. This is in part fueled and spread by the PS and other opposition parties like the National Coalition Party and the Christian Democrats. The Finnish media is another culprit that maintains and, willingly or unwillingly, promotes Islamophobia. An article in November by Finland’s biggest daily, Helsingin Sanomat, blamed groups of violent youths of mostly “migrant backgrounds” for crimes in the capital.12 “A person of migrant background” is a code word for Muslim or brown Finns. Even if Helsingin Sanomat published a subsequent article refuting its earlier claims by stating that youth crime was not rising in Helsinki and that Finland was not on course of suffering social problems with migrants like in Sweden,13 parties such as the PS used the news to spread their vengeful agenda of “harmful immigration” and of how the country should stop accepting asylum seekers from Muslim and African countries.14 The story created a sense of collective panic and showed once again how the “Muslim story” is an incendiary topic. A story that dominated headlines at the end of the year was the ongoing repatriation of Finnish women who are alleged to have assisted “Isis” terrorists, and their children from the al-Hol refugee camp in Syria.15 After a year, for the first time, the Finnish government repatriated two mothers and six children from the camp.16 The repatriation has been a political hot potato that called for Foreign Minister Pekka Haavisto’s resignation.17 The PS and other groups received further ammunition to demonize Muslims when parliament voted to criminalize female genital cutting.18 Furthermore, the PS aims to prohibit the circumcision of boys.

Just like in many democratic Western societies, politics have become polarized in Finland as well and have come to resemble in some respects the bombastic language of former U.S. President Donald Trump who sees Muslims as a threat. The result of the U.S. presidential elections was a blow to Islamophobes and populist parties like the PS, whose politicians support Trump. PS Chairperson Jussi Halla-aho in 2019 tweeted that Trump is “the best that could have happened to the United States and the Western world. An unfortunate example of double standards was the Finnish parliament’s failure to lift PS MP Juha Mäenpää’s immunity from prosecution after he referred to asylum seekers in a parliamentary session as “an invasive species.” Contrarily, MP Ano Turtianen was expelled from the PS parliamentary group after publicly mocking George Floyd’s death.

Physical and Verbal Attacks

Contrary to previous years, there were no reports in 2020 of mosques being vandalised. The last person to vandalise the Oulu mosque in 2019 – this was the ninth such incident in the same year - was an unemployed Finn who was sentenced and fined 400 euros for the crime. There were two cases involving violence against Muslims that received national attention: in April, an eighteen-year-old Somali Finn was killed after being stabbed in Helsinki; and in July, a group of townspeople from Teuva in Western Finland allegedly racially harassed, chased, and physically assaulted a young Muslim, who ended up in hospital for the treatment of his wounds. While the white Finn who killed the Somali youth was handed a five-year sentence for manslaughter, no charges were brought against the perpetrators of the Teuva incident in December and was still under investigation by the police despite it happening in June. The victim, Fares Al-Obaidl, stated, “The fact that I know nothing about my case [and the charges] gives me the impression that what happened to me isn’t important to the police. Those who attacked me are walking freely with no consequences.”

youth who was killed are not satisfied with the sentence. “The person [who stabbed my son] alleged that he was scared by my son’s presence, of that dark-skinned person was walking towards him down the stairs,” said the mother.27

Some hate crimes may even be overlooked by the police. One such case might be that of an Iraqi asylum seeker who was threatened in July 2019 with a knife in the Central Finnish town of Jämsänkoski.29 According to the asylum seeker, a white Finn threatened him with a knife and called him “a fking asylum seeker” and “fking foreigner.” The victim said that despite having told the police about the racist slurs, which is a bias motivator in a hate crime, they were not cited in the charges. Under the Finnish Criminal Code, a bias motivator such as ethnic background is grounds for enhancement of punishment.30 The suspect was sentenced to a one-month prison term and forced to pay the victim 700 euros in damages.31

27. Tessieri, “Keyse Abdifata Maalesh’s Parents Are Unhappy with the Involuntary Manslaughter Sentence.”
Among the consequences of Islamophobia are the social vulnerability and poverty that impact groups like Muslims especially hard. The Finnish Institute for Health and Welfare (THL) said in a statement that one in four people who don't speak Finnish, Swedish, and Sami as their mother tongue have been infected by the coronavirus. The proportion is especially high considering that the former group account for about 8% of Finland's total population. A case in point is when members of the Somali community were singled out and labelled in a statement by Helsinki Mayor Jan Vapaavuori. In April, Vapaavuori said that cases among the Somali-speaking community were much higher than among the rest of the population. “Close to 200 cases have been identified to date, which translates to 1.8% of the Somali community in the capital, compared with the 0.2% average among all of Helsinki residents.” The pandemic also triggered hostile reactions from the PS against the Muslim community. The tweet below by the party's secretary, Simo Gröndahl, is an example.

A study by the Non-Discrimination Ombudsman reinforced the findings of previous studies that showed that the majority of People of African Descent (PAD) face racism in Finland on a daily basis. Racist encounters can occur at the workplace, school, and in public spaces. The biggest PAD group in Finland is the Somali community with some 21,920 members who speak Somali as their mother tongue. Rainer Hiltunen, the acting Non-Discrimination Ombudsman, said that the report’s findings confirm that racism is deeply rooted in Finnish society. The report stated that 67% of the respondents faced discrimination or harassment at school and 60% at the workplace. As many as 61% of respondents who were victims of racial discrimination did not report it to the authorities.

Another study by Onjen Obućina and Ilari Imakunnas revealed that poverty and overcrowded housing are more prevalent among immigrant children and vulnerable groups like Muslims than among white Finnish children. The study, which does not correlate Islamophobia with poor living conditions, showed that as many as 60% of migrant children had experienced poverty for at least a year during the first five years of their lives, while 45% of migrant children faced overcrowding. The corresponding figure for white Finnish children was 25%.

Figure 4: “Yle [Finnish Broadcasting Company] offers news briefs about (the) Corona (pandemic) in (the) Somali, Kurdish, Persian and Arabic [languages]. On morning TV, they cried out for the expansion of news [broadcasts] in foreign languages. This is not the way to go. If you want to hear news in Arabic paid by [Finnish] taxes, you should then move to a country where they speak Arabic.”

39. Email from Ognjen Obucina (11 October 2020 published with the consent of the author), where she states the following:
   • “We have no information on religion. We can identify children from predominantly Muslim countries, but we cannot be sure what share of them are actually Muslims.
   • Children from Muslim countries (Iraq, Iran, Somalia) are indeed among the most vulnerable groups, especially when it comes to income poverty (although their disadvantage with respect to overcrowding is substantial as well).
   • Nevertheless, it is important to point out that, given that you are writing a report on Islamophobia, we do not know whether and to what extent these results are due to discrimination (or, more particularly, due to Islamophobia). For instance, attitudes towards participation in the labor market (especially among women) may be a very important factor as well. There are, however, Finnish studies who looked at discrimination of immigrants in different social settings.”
Employment

The most recent Diversity Barometer of the Finnish Institute of Occupational Health (FIOH) states that workplace attitudes concerning diversity have changed. Today, 78% of those polled accept and encourage people to be open to difference at the workplace compared with 61% in 2011. Moreover, the FIOH barometer claims that attitudes towards work-related immigration have changed with 86% of those surveyed promoting such immigration compared with 59% in early 2010. While such barometer findings are encouraging, unemployment rates tell another story about Finland’s labor market, which is as racialized and segregated as in other EU countries.

The unemployment rate of people who don’t speak Finnish, Swedish, or Saami as their mother tongue, stood at 19.3% in 2018 versus the national average of 8.96%, according to the latest Statistics Finland figures. Some of the Muslim-dominant language groups that reported the highest unemployment levels were Chechen speakers (47.7%), Arabic speakers (45%), Somali speakers (35.8%), Kurdish speakers (35.6%), Pashto Afghan speakers (35.6%), Persian-Farsi speakers (31.5%), Azerbaijani speakers (30.3%), Turkish speakers (22.5%), and Urdu speakers (17.3%). By sex, the national unemployment rate for men and women during the period under review was 10.3% and 7.6% respectively. Unemployment among Muslim women was higher than for men in the same group even if they had the same educational background. The unemployment rate for Arabic-speaking women was 60.2% and for Somali-speaking women 40.3%. The corresponding figure for men was 39.3% and 32.6% respectively. Of all the Nordic countries, Finland has performed the worst when it comes to employing migrant women. The employment rate of migrant women was 55% while for migrant men it was 72%.

Education

In Finland, religious education is compulsory in comprehensive school (7-16 years), and in senior and upper secondary school (16-19 years). Students have the right to classes consistent with their own religious beliefs if there is a minimum of three pupils from the same group. An often-heard complaint from Muslim parents is that their children are getting deficient schooling on Islam because teachers are mostly unqualified and few are Muslims, who can also be unqualified. The Salam series, which was published by the Finnish National Agency for Education (Opetushallitus) for comprehensive and middle school, is a positive sign. The new Salam series for grades 7-9 was published in spring.

Politics

Finland has been gripped by a populist, Islamophobic party with fringe, radical-right elements ever since the parliamentary elections of 2011, when the Finns Party (PS) won a historic 39 seats. An especially worrying sign for Muslims and other visible migrants and minorities in Finland is the close relationship between the PS and parties like the National Coalition Party (Kokoomus), the third-largest party in parliament with 38 seats. Kokoomus’ Chairperson Petteri Orpo did not rule out the possibility of forming a government with the PS in October and accepting its chairperson, Jussi Halla-aho, as the future prime minister. Such future cooperation may, however, be easier said than done. Halla-aho is a controversial figure in Finnish politics and was convicted for ethnic agitation and breaching the sanctity of religion in 2012. He has a long history of Islamophobic, anti-Semitic, misogynist, and homophobic blog posts dating from the 2000s. Even if he is trying to give the impression that he has moderated his radical and racist views, many believe this to be a spoof.

Figure 5: Apart from liking U.S. President Donald Trump and Hungarian strongman Viktor Orbán, Halla-aho tweets that we’d have “no reason to masturbate” if there were no news about migration and asylum seekers.

44. Telephone conversation with Imam Abbas Bahmanpour. He stated that the majority of teachers teaching Islam are unqualified.
In order to understand the immigration and asylum mindset of the PS, we should cast our attention on the Danish People's Party (DPP) with which it has long-standing ties. The DPP has been instrumental in turning Denmark into one of the most Islamophobic countries in the EU. Apart from turning a blind eye to far-right elements in the party, Halla-aho, like his party secretary Simo Grönroos, 49 has stated that asylum seekers from Muslim and African countries should be stopped “because they have great difficulties in integrating” in Finland and are prone to committing crimes. 50

In many respects, the PS is a cut-and-paste job of the Islamophobic rhetoric spewed throughout Europe. One of these is fearmongering that white Finns will become a minority in the country due to asylum seekers, which is a code word for Muslim. 51 At least five PS MPs are members of Suomen Sisu, an association that promotes the writings of former Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard David Duke and Alfred Rosenberg, a Nazi war criminal hanged in Nuremberg in 1946 for crimes against humanity. The PS has ties with far-right and neo-Nazi groups like Kansallismielisten liitouma (KL), which was established in 2018 and has attracted party members from the far-right vigilante group Soldiers of Odin, and the now-outlawed Nordic Resistance Movement (PVL). 52 The party’s language is toxic and it commonly labels asylum seekers as “harmful migration.” They go as far as to refer to asylum seekers as “an invasive species” as happened during a session of parliament. 53

Sometimes, the far-right and xenophobic rhetoric of the party can turn against it. This happened in July when Pekka Kataja, a PS councilor of Jämsänkoski, was brutally attacked at his home by two people. One of the suspects is in police custody for attempted murder charges and is a former member of the PS. The suspect, Teemu Torssonen, had allegedly a personal score to settle with Kataja who excluded him for running for MP in 2019 due to his far-right views. 54 In April 2021, Finland will hold municipal elections and all eyes are on how parties like the PS will fare.

Figure 6 (left): MP Veikko Vallin took pictures secretly of a nursery in Helsinki and published them on social media. Some of the faces of the people and children could be recognised. He called the nursery school helper wearing a hijab “an Isis wife.” He commented sarcastically that such a dress worn by the woman was “trendy.”

Figure 7 (right): MP Vallin apologised for taking and publishing the pictures but stated, “I still won’t change my critical opinion of these full-body black religious dresses used at the nursery.” It should be noted that Islamophobic politicians attempt to get their message across to their voters in this way: you do or say something outrageous on social media and then apologise, but it does not matter because the story is already out there.

Media

A provocative story published by Helsingin Sanomat on youth crime in Helsinki caused a furor. The daily retracted its original article 15 hours later. The retraction stated that based on police statistics youth crime was declining in Helsinki and not rising as the original article claimed. Another article published following day interviewed experts who assured readers that Finland was not on the same path as Sweden concerning failed integration policies (sic). The first publication brought memories of how the media handled the reporting of the Oulu sexual assault cases, which fanned the... flames of fear and Islamophobia. Helsingin Sanomat published a column\(^{64}\) two days after the first story claiming that the commotion the article had caused revealed how difficult it still is to debate migration issues in Finland. The columnist wrote that the news story did not mean to imply that all youths with so-called migrant backgrounds are criminals. Despite such retractions, the PS used the article to promote its Islamophobic agenda.

Factors like the lack of cultural and ethnic diversity ensure that the national media continue to be biased and underreport topics of importance to Muslims from their perspective. The hysteria caused by the media reports on the Oulu sexual assault cases in 2019 is a low point in Finnish journalism.\(^\text{62}\) Dr. Abdul Mannan said that the Oulu daily, Kaleva, never published any pictures of the vandalism against the mosque in that city. “The stories were small and they [Kaleva] never published pictures and gave little coverage [of the news],” said Dr. Mannan. “We asked the previous interior minister [Kai Mykkänen] for 30,000 euros to build a wall around the mosque but we never received the money even if the Jewish community was allocated one million euros [since 2015] to improve security.”

One has only to do a search on the Helsingin Sanomat website to see how little reporting there is on a topic like Islamophobia. During the first ten months of the year, only four stories were published on the topic. Three of them are from abroad and only one focuses on Finland and specifically on the topic of the Muslim LGBTQ community. The Finnish Broadcasting Company (Yle) does not do any better. The reporting of news that impacts the Muslim community reveals bias and that the media is part of Finland’s Islamophobia problem.

Justice System

Finland criminalised female genital cutting (FGC) and there are plans by the PS to prohibit the circumcision of boys with the help of a citizens’ initiative.\(^\text{63}\) In neighboring Sweden, where FGC is criminalised as well, very few cases have appeared. The debate on the practice appeared more like an exercise in Islamophobia for the PS which strived to show its voters how incompatible Islam is with the West. Very little was mentioned about how to offer help to the victims of such a practice. On the terrorism front, Finland plans to tighten legislation concerning the financing of terrorism. If a person is found guilty of financing a terrorist group, imprisonment will rise

Internet

The Internet continues to be the springboard for spreading anti-Muslim racism by Islamophobic groups and parties like the PS. In 2019, Måns Enqvist of the National Board of Police of Finland said that there were at the most 10 police officers monitoring online hate speech.65 While the number of police officers is small, the group that monitored online hate speech has been merged with other units that monitor the Internet. Enqvist said that such a decision has produced good results with ethnic agitation cases rising three times to 105 in 2019 from 34 in 2018.66 In the face of hate speech cases, only 29 reached the district court in 2019, which was down from 31 in the previous year. All of these statistics are, however, only the tip of the iceberg. The most common platform where hate speech occurred in 2019 was clearly Facebook, but there were also cases on Twitter, YouTube, Ylilauta, and Periscope.67 Websites that spread Islamophobia are Suomen Uutiset (the official newspaper of the PS); Oikea media; Uusi MV-lehti; Nykysuomi; Laiton lehti; kansallisromantikko.fi; and PT-media. Far-right and neo-Nazi sites include the Soldiers of Odin; Kohi vapautta (a site run by the outlawed neo-Nazi party PVL); Kansallismielisten liittouma; Sinimustaliike, a new political party; and the YouTube channel of Monokulttuuri FM/Vihapuhe FM. Reporting hate speech, death threats, and defamation on the Internet to the police is usually a long process and it can take months before their cases are addressed - if ever. Only a minority of such cases ever go to court.

Silakkaliike, or the Baltic Herring Movement, is an anti-racism Facebook page that was founded in December 2019. Two weeks after its launch, it had attracted over 24,000 likes on Facebook and 13,700 followers on Twitter. On 14 November 2020, Silakkaliike had 28,900 likes and 14,500 followers.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

All of the Finns Party’s (PS) 38 lawmakers as well as Ano Turtiainen who was banned from the parliamentary group, had one matter in common: spreading and promoting Islamophobia. Some of the most “notable” representatives of this network were: Jussi Halla-aho, Riikka Purra, Ville Tavio, Laura Huhtasaari, Sanna Antikainen, Mauri Peltokantas, Juha Mäenpää, Mari Rantanen, Veikko Vallin, and others like Matias Törk

66. Email from Måns Enqvist on 23 October 2020.
kila and Asseri Kinnunen, the former PS Youth leader. Others worth noting are National Coalition Party politicians like Wille Rydman, Atte Kaleva, and Seida Sohrabi; Sarah Essayah and Päivi Räsänen of the Christian Democrats; and Junnes Lokka and Tiina Wiik, far-right councilpersons of Oulu.

If we approach the leaders of the Muslim community, many of them will state that the best way to counter Islamophobia is more contact and a candid dialogue with white Finns. While Finland’s official integration policy promotes two-way adaption in theory, in practice it is a different story. In the Nordic welfare state tradition, social equality, like gender equality, is especially promoted, but how to attain social equity is not emphasised or encouraged enough to newly arrived migrants. Erna Bodström’s doctoral dissertation highlights some of the problems of the integration program, which are even worse among Muslims and people of color due to their low socio-economic status. New migrants are taught how to use social services and how to find employment but there is too little on cultural integration and how to challenge discrimination. “As for interaction [in the brochures], the texts guide the migrants to integrate first and foremost into the welfare state and not with the local citizens,” Bodström writes.68

As mentioned earlier, the rhetoric against Muslims in Finland is spread by the PS, which warns about Islamisation and how white Finns will become a minority in their country. While there is some pushback on these types of conspiracy theories, there is still not enough. This could be attributable to the fact that cultural and ethnic diversity is a relatively new phenomenon in Finland or simply to the undercurrent of well-entrenched racism in Finnish society. As the foreign population grows, we may well see a rise in racism. Compared with other EU countries, Finland’s foreign-born population is still small amounting to 404,179 people in 2019 (7.3% of the total population).69

While the aims of Prime Minister Marin’s government program and sensible Finns want to tackle social inequality,70 one good starting point would be to accept that Muslims and other minorities are here to stay and that Finland is their home.

Instead of labeling their Finnish-born children as “people of migrant background,” a language that promotes inclusion should be used. Moreover, while parties like the PS claim that people of color are a drain on taxes and a burden on society, leadership by politicians is needed to drive home the fact that it is more effective to integrate rather than to exclude groups like Muslims. The journey to a more equitable society is a long one, but the journey must begin now. Islamophobia must be challenged head on.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Even if Finland’s Muslim population is small when compared with other EU countries, it faces many of the same challenges. Below are some recommendations on how to raise public and political awareness of Islamophobia:

- Treat Islamophobia as a social ill that threatens society.
- Encourage a stronger adherence by the authorities to enforcing anti-discrimination laws.
- Allocate more resources to monitor effectively hate speech, hate crime, discrimination and racism cases in general.
- Deliver faster justice in court cases of racism, discrimination, hate speech, and hate crime.
- Instead of only advocating social equity, there should be more emphasis on promoting equity.
- Create more cultural and ethnic diversity in civil servant jobs like the police.
- Prohibit holding a public office for politicians who have been convicted of ethnic agitation or other serious crimes.
- Invest in studies that continue to reveal the toxicity and threat of Islamophobia for society.
- Promote and enforce the fact that Muslims and other minorities are equal, and encourage them to be active members of society.
- Since Muslims are also Finns, the language used to label them should change. Finns must stop referring to Muslim children as “people of foreign or migrant background”.
- Anti-racism education should be mandatory starting in comprehensive school.
- Integration is a two-way process, not a one-way process.
- Each culture has their own public space in Finland, and it should be promoted, protected and respected.

Chronology

- 28.01.2020: “What happened [vandalising the Turku Synagogue on Holocaust Remembrance Day] is a general trend [in Finland] and should be seen in such a light,” stated Harry Serlo, a spokesperson of the Jewish Community of Turku. “I don’t like to talk just about anti-Semitism but how all minorities are targets of such hatred [these days].”

- 23.02.2020: Former PS Youth Vice President, Toni Jalonen, admitted, “I am an ethnonationalist, traditionalist, and a fascist.”

- 12.06.2020: Interior Minister Maria Ohisalo of the Green League, admitted that even if there is a lot of trust in the police, this is not the case among all minority and population groups. “The aim of the Ministry of the Interior, as well as what is written in the joint Government program, is to recruit people of different ethnic backgrounds to be trained in the police [service].”

- 17.06.2020: An editorial in the Teuva newspaper Téjuka strongly condemned the attack against a young Muslim in June. “We should not allow racism under any circumstances or in any form. It is very sad that the other weekend we had to see that such [an attack] happen in 2020 Finland. Matters must change: it is the duty of the whole society to work to do away with prejudices, to accept cultural diversity, and to build a Finland that is more acceptant [of difference].”

- 01.10.2020: Speaking before a session of parliament, PS Chairperson Jussi Halla-aho scapegoated Muslims by stating that their numbers are growing especially in the Helsinki region. “This demographic development worsens the municipal and state housing situation, it brings more crime and uncertainty. These are cold statistics. Immigration from Africa and the Middle East is harmful and becomes more harmful as their numbers grow.”

- 19.10.2020: “If upright politicians would speak out against Islamophobia like they do against other forms of racism, it would be a big step in the right direction,” said the iman of the Resalat Islamic Society of Finland, Abbas Bahmanpour. “Unfortunately, we often see them stepping aside and making way for far-right politicians. It is time for those who have a say to step up and be a voice for the voiceless. It’s time for value-based leadership. It’s time for real leadership.”

- 20.10.2020: “You cannot do efficient work [against Islamophobia] without proper resources. If there is no debate [in society] and nothing is done to promote it [anti-racism], it will not be seen as a problem. It is a lengthy process,” said Hunderra Assefa, the representative of Young Muslims Finland (NUMU) at the advisory board on non-discrimination (Yhdenvertaisuusasioiden neuvotelukunta).76

- 20.10.2020: “There is no room in Finland for parallel societies (sic) where the laws of the land and its way of life are not respected. We seek to improve equality and our Western values – not send them backwards. For example, Finland is not an Islamic country – just to state the obvious – and Finns do not have to change their way of life. It is the other way around,” said PS MP Veikko Vallin.77

- 21.10.2020: “Speaking about my experiences, othering is the biggest issue that Muslims continue to face in Finland. It appears in a lot of discussions on the Internet. Muslims are not seen as “us” [by society] or even as Finns. I see this as a big problem [in 2020],” said Nuha Abuzaid, chairperson of the association Young Muslims.

- 22.10.2020: In a session of parliament, PS MP Leena Meri asked about the Islamist suspect who beheaded the French teacher Samuel Paty.78 “Do you plan to expel Islamist extremists from Finland like France, and how can you guarantee that nothing of the sort happens in Finland and defend freedom of expression?”

- 21.12.2020: Social Democrat MP Hussin al-Taee responding to PS MP Riikka Purra on AlfaTV stated, “In a country founded on the rule of law, we do not distinguish who is a [real] Finn. If a person is a Finn, then he is a Finn.”79

The year 2020 will be remembered in France as a major turning point in terms of public policy and political discourse reminiscent of a dark period in its history. Through the latter, a complex process of otherness based on the sign of real or supposed belonging to Islam is initiated (signals of radicalisation, discourse on separatism, etc.). By otherness we mean reducing the intentions, social actions, and perceptions of real or supposed Muslims to an exclusively essentialized religious action. Indeed, this year has been marked by the debates around the bill “for the reinforcement of Republican principles”, in which many measures could be described as a serious infringement of various fundamental freedoms. President Macron has repeatedly expressed the will to create an “Islam of the Enlightenment”, an “Islam of France”. In the media, the spread of Covid-19 has been correlated with Muslims and has exacerbated already entrenched issues.

Authoritarian aberrations are becoming more and more noticeable and common this particular year, by means of procedures such as “systematic hindrance” which makes use of mechanisms provided in the SILT law (closure of places of worship, home visits), and use of other legal instruments to hinder or close down activities that are disturbing or on which there is the slightest suspicion (independent Muslim schools, places of worship, associations defending the rights of Muslims, humanitarian associations, etc.). In addition, there is a sociological phenomenon of increased “femonationalism” with the instrumentalisation of gender equality in the name of prerogatives and issues that are used for racial purposes. There is a will to show that the problem of women’s status is only concentrated in areas such as suburbs or linked to Muslim populations in order to use the feminist issue for specific purposes.

The modus operandi already in place was reinforced by the tragic assassination of Samuel Paty, history professor at Conflans-Sainte-Honorine. In the wake of the tragedy, humanitarian NGOs (BarakaCity), anti-racist NGOs (CCIF), schools where the Koran is taught (Association Apprendre et Comprendre) but also mosques (Pantin) and schools (MHS Paris) were dissolved or closed down administratively for unfounded reasons - except for their proximity to “Muslims”. Under the pretext of the fight against “radicalisation” and “separatism”, fundamental freedoms are being flouted, and this, as part of a well-orchestrated political agenda.
Note de synthèse

En 2020, la France va être le théâtre d’un tournant majeur dans les politiques publiques et les discours politiques tenus. Par ces derniers, un processus complexe d’altérisation qui s’appuie sur le signe d’appartenance réelle ou supposée à la religion musulmane est amorcé (cf. signaux faibles, discours sur le séparatisme…etc.). Par altérisation, nous entendons le fait de réduire les intentions, l’agir social, et les perceptions des musulmans réels ou supposés, à un agir religieux exclusif. En effet, cette année a été rythmée par les débats autour du projet de loi “confortant les principes républicains », dans lequel de nombreuses mesures pourraient être qualifiées d’atteinte grave à diverses libertés fondamentales. Assurément, le Président Macron est allé jusqu’à manifester la volonté de créer un « islam des lumières », un « islam de France ». La propagation de la Covid-19 elle-même a fait l’objet de corrélation avec les musulmans de France dans les médias et a exacerbé les problématiques déjà bien ancrées.

Les dérives autoritaires sont intensifiées et rythment cette année particulière, par des procédés tels que l’ « entrave systématique » qui vont se servir de mécanismes prévus par la loi SILT (fermeture des lieux de culte, visites domiciliaires), et d’autres instruments de droit permettant d’entraver voire fermer les activités qui dérangent ou sur les quelles pèsent le moindre soupçon (écoles hors-contrat musulmanes, lieux de cultes, associations de défense des droits des musulmans, associations humanitaires etc.). En outre, on observe un phénomène sociologique de « fémonationalisme » accru avec l’instrumentalisation de l’égalité homme-femme, au nom de prérogatives et d’enjeux qui sont utilisés à des fins raciales. On fait croire que le problème de la condition féminine est uniquement concentré dans des zones comme les banlieues ou lié aux populations musulmanes pour user de la question féministe à des fins particulières et motivées.

Ce mode opératoire déjà en place a été renforcé par le tragique assassinat de Samuel Paty, professeur d’histoire à Conflans Sainte Honorine. A la suite de ce dernier, ce sont des ONG humanitaires (Barakacity), de défense des droits humains (CCIF), des écoles où l’on enseigne le coran (Association Apprendre et Comprendre) mais encore des mosquées (Pantin) ou des établissements scolaires (MHS Paris) qui se sont vus dissous ou fermés administrativement pour des motifs infondés si ce n’est leur proximité de près ou de loin avec « les musulmans ». Sous couvert de lutte contre la « radicalisation » et contre le « séparatisme » ce sont des libertés fondamentales qui sont bafouées, et cela, dans le respect d’un agenda politique bien orchestré.
Country Profile
EIR 2020

Country: France Republic
Type of Regime: Unitary constitutional republic
Form of Government: Semi-presidential system
Ruling Parties: La République En Marche! (right)
Opposition Parties: Le Rassemblement National, Les Républicains, La France Insoumise

Major Languages: French

Statistics on Islamophobia: The Observatoire National de Lutte contre l’Islamophobie recorded 235 Islamophobic acts from 1 January to 31 December 2020 (compared to 154 for the year 2019), i.e. 53% more acts. There was a 14% increase in acts and a 79% increase in threats. In addition, attacks on places of worship increased by 35%. Cemeteries were vandalised three times in 2020 compared to seven times in 2019. The regions most affected by anti-Muslim acts were Île-de-France, Provence-Alpes-Côte d’Azur (PACA), and Rhône-Alpes. Data from the CCIF could not be collected due to its dissolution by the state.

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: The number of racist and xenophobic incidents increased in 2019, with 1,142 incidents recorded (compared with 496 in 2018). Most of these incidents fall under the category of “threats” (977).

Major Religions (% of Population): The compilation of official statistics based on religious beliefs is not permitted by French law. Depending on the methodology applied by the surveys, the figures may differ. For example, according to a note published in GeoConfluences, 64% of the French are Catholics (of which 4.5% regularly go to Sunday mass), 63% have no religion, 6.4% are Muslims, and 0.5% are Jews (see various studies on this subject in “Statistiques sur la pratique religieuse en France”, GeoConfluences, December 2016).

However, according to a survey commissioned by the Observatoire de la laïcité at the Vivavoice Institute, 34% of people claim to belong to no religion, 3% of people feel they belong to Islam, 3% to Protestantism, 2% to Buddhism, 1% to Judaism, 1% to Orthodox Christianity, 1% others, 48% to Catholicism, and 7% of those surveyed did not wish to answer.

Muslim Population (% of Population): The compilation of official statistics based on religious beliefs is not permitted by French law. According to the Pew Research Center, the Muslim population may stand between 6 and 10.5% of the total French population.

Main Muslim Community Organisations: CFCM (Conseil français du culte musulman), UMF (Union des mosquées de France), Islam de France, DITIB, Milli Görüş, L.E.S Musulmans, Association musulmane pour l’islam de France, and Musulmans de France (ex-UOIF).

Main NGOs Combatting Islamophobia: CCIF (Collectif contre l’islamophobie en France) which was closed by government decree in late 2020; CRI (Coordination contre le racisme et l’islamophobie); CJL (Comité Justice et Libertés pour tous); and ADM (Action Droits des Musulmans).

Far-Right Parties: The National Rally (Rassemblement national, RN), France Arise (Debout la France), The Patriots (Les Patriotes).

Limitations to Islamic Practices

- Hijab Ban: Ban of religious symbols including Muslim headscarf from primary school to high school (2004); The El Khomri Law (2016) now allows each French company to introduce the “principle of neutrality” into its internal regulations. In a ruling of 23 July 2019, the Lyon Administrative Court of Appeal ruled that parents of pupils, just like teachers, are required to respect the principle of neutrality during school activities organised in the classroom.

- Halal Slaughter Ban: CJUE Arrêt C-336/19 Centraal Israëlitisch Consistorie van België e.a. states that in order to promote animal welfare in the context of ritual slaughter, member states may, without disregarding the fundamental rights enshrined in the charter, impose a reversible stunning procedure that is not likely to result in the death of the animal.

- Minaret Ban: No (depends on local decisions)
- Circumcision Ban: No

Introduction

The year 2020 marks a turning point in Islamophobia and in the treatment of Muslims in France. The repercussions of the assassination of Samuel Paty added to the already established “systematic hindrance” and the effects of the SILT Law (Law for the reinforcement of internal security and the fight against terrorism) proved the year 2020 to be the most repressive year of the last decade for the French Muslim community. The state targeted through different means both individuals (whether they be adults or children) and Muslim establishments and associations, hence restricting individual freedoms and violating several international texts and conventions as well as a number of well-rooted human rights such as freedom of speech, religion or belief, and association.

If, for some years now, the French government has been misusing the concept of “laïcité” (French version of secularism) to make it a weapon to the disadvantage of French Muslims and Islam - leading to socio-economic exclusion of many Muslims, and in particular Muslim women wearing headscarves -, in 2020, it largely reinforced the offensive to justify more than ever the intrusion of the state in the religious and political practices of Muslims, even going so far as to create an “Islam of France” by recruiting and training imams itself and drafting a “Charter of Principles for the Islam of France”.¹

According to the latest study by the National Consultative Commission on Human Rights (CNCDH),² racially motivated crimes increased by 11% during 2019 with a 54% increase in Islamophobic acts compared to the previous year. The Collective against Islamophobia in France (CCIF)³ reported rising anti-Muslim sentiment in France and found that in 2019, there were nearly 800 anti-Muslim acts, a 77% increase in two years. The CCIF, a leading French anti-racist organisation combatting Islamophobia, would have published the data for the year 2020 like it had been doing since 2003 if it had not been targeted and dissolved by the government for denouncing state Islamophobia and as part of the generalised governmental crackdown on Muslims and associations fighting Islamophobia.

There is increasing evidence that institutions are one of the main perpetrators of racial discrimination against Muslims in France, especially since the state of emergency in 2015-2017 that was then institution alised in common law.⁴ According to

Amnesty International, “French authorities disproportionately targeted Muslims with heavy security measures without due process leading to long-term consequences for the targeted individuals and their family members including fear, stress and other health-related issues.”5 The UN Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms shared her concern that while countering terrorism French Arab and/or Muslim communities “are being constructed as a per se ‘suspect group’ through the sustained application of counterterrorism law.”6

The recent developments including the horrific murder of teacher Samuel Paty have fuelled anti-Muslim rhetoric and paved the way for a legitimate and overt punishment of French Muslims through legal and illegal means. Political figures such as the Minister of the Interior Gérald Darmanin or the Mayor of Nice Christian Estrosi, have publicly called for the circumvention of the rule of law in order to fight “political Islam” and “Islamist separatism”.7 Bypassing a century’s established rule of law is dangerous enough, but bypassing it to fight notions that are vaguely defined and ravenously lack scientific and social conceptualisation is even more dangerous. Ultimately, it will only harm the French Muslim community.

Intelligence services have also mentioned they will undertake mass surveillance of a large part of the French Muslim population. Amnesty International has recently raised concerns that these new counter-terrorism measures “violate the principles of non-discrimination, non-refoulement, and the right to freedom of association”.8

In practice, the state has engaged in a veritable witch-hunt, and has raided and shut down dozens of Muslim establishments and associations considered a national threat or an “enemy of the Republic”. Nevertheless, Darmanin publicly admitted that those raids were only a way to send a message; in other words, combatting the so-called war on terror by terrorising and stigmatising a whole group.

In the end, the bill against separatism announced by Macron in 2020 raises concerns over the labelling of imams; the possibilities for local authorities to dissolve Islamic organisations without any legal proceeding or due process; the forbidding of any non-religious activities for religious organisations; the coercive controls on civil society organisations who work on Islamophobia; and the enlargement of headscarf bans.

Physical and Verbal Attacks

The Observatoire National de Lutte contre l'Islamophobie (National Observatory for the Fight against Islamophobia) has just published its annual report on Islamophobic acts in France. It notes a 53% increase in such acts compared to 2019 with 235 anti-Muslim acts compared to 154 the previous year. It indicates an increase in what it describes as Islamophobic “actions” by 14%, “threats” by 79%, and “places of worship” by 35%. It notes that the geographic regions most affected by Islamophobia are Paris and its suburbs (Île-de-France), Provence-Alpes-Côte d’Azur (PACA), and Rhône-Alpes. Nevertheless, it points out that these figures do not reflect reality because many people in charge of places of worship do not wish to lodge a complaint, considering that investigations are rarely successful.

Indeed, several studies including the one of the National Consultative Commission on Human Rights have shown the lack of confidence of victims of racism in the public authorities and that as a result they do not file complaints. The phenomenon of the under reporting of racist acts, including Islamophobic acts, at police stations increases the dark figure of racism and, in this case, the dark figure of Islamophobia.

The notion of a dark figure encompasses all criminal acts that are not registered and spotted by the legal system and which, thus, distort the real data of racism, inevitably entailing consequences on the victims and on society as a whole. The dark figure is an issue that antiracist organisations face daily in their fight against Islamophobia; however, surveys and reports show that this phenomenon is rampant in all forms of racism and discrimination. Several explanations are provided, in particular the lack of knowledge when it comes to the concept of discrimination. Victims and the police do not always know what discrimination is about. The same goes for the concept of Islamophobia and the definition of hate crime, among other things. Police officers who are not trained in these concepts tend not to register the complaint and/or make the complaint process difficult. The bad reception of the victims at the police stations, bad care, and the lack of confidence and mistrust in the public authorities also explain the dark figure phenomenon. The data then registered by the Ministries of the Interior in Europe and by anti-racist organisations only represents the tip of the iceberg, and hamper the proper visibility of the problem.

Thus, neither the figures of the Ministry of the Interior nor even those of the Observatoire National de l’Islamophobie reflect the Islamophobic reality in France. The data that came closest to the Islamophobic reality was that of the Collectif contre l’islamophobie en France (CCIF). If the data differs between the two bodies (Ministry and CCIF), it is because the former only records complaints lodged at police stations while the latter takes into account all complaints of Islamophobia received through its hotline or website that are not necessarily reported to the police.

As a result, in 2019, the Ministry of the Interior reported 154 Islamophobic incidents whilst the CCIF received 789 report forms referring to 1,043 Islamophobic incidents.

However, for the year 2020, the CCIF has not been able to publish its annual data on Islamophobia since it has been dissolved by the government as will be discussed in the section entitled “Politics”.

This means that no detailed Islamophobic data classified by category and nature with precise analyses, like those provided by the CCIF annually, is available at the moment for France – Europe’s most Islamophobic country. Data is scarce, nonetheless, examples of physical and verbal attacks are numerous.

According to the OSCE, hate crimes are criminal acts motivated by bias or prejudice towards particular groups of people. To be considered a hate crime, the offence must meet two criteria. The first is that the act constitutes an offence under criminal law. The second is that the act must have been motivated by bias.

On 18 October 2020, two days after the assassination of Samuel Paty, two veiled women were stabbed near the Eiffel Tower. The two suspects were charged for “violence in group aggravated by the use of a weapon, drunkenness, and racist remarks,” said a judicial source. The alleged perpetrator was placed in pre-trial detention and her friend was left free under judicial supervision, according to sources close to the case. The attack is allegedly linked to the presence of their dog, which was considered threatening to a group of women with their children, two of whom were consequently attacked. During the altercation, the main suspect pulled out a knife and stabbed the two women. According to Le Point, the case was widely reported on social networks, with some Internet users denouncing a “media silence” on this “Islamophobic” attack. The victims’ lawyer, Arié Alimi, filed a complaint for the investigation to be reclassified as “attempted murder on the grounds that the victim belonged to a race or religion”. The first victim, aged 19, was stabbed three times with a knife. The second, a 40-year-old woman, was injured by six blows, one of which punctured her lung. The attackers called both women “dirty Arabs” and told them “you are not at home here”, while one of them also referred to the veil the victims wore as “that thing you have on your head”. According to the victims’ lawyer, “the motive is clearly racist because they targeted the veiled women and tried to tear it off.” The homicidal intent is not in doubt either, since the first blow was aimed at the head.

Other Islamophobic acts such as vandalism of mosques were recorded by the CCIF in 2020. On 26 July, several tags including a swastika were found on the façade of the Agen mosque.16

On 7 August 2020, the mosque in Bron17 was burnt down and almost 100 square meters of the ground floor were totally destroyed by the fire. The fire started in a room annexed to the mosque. According to the public prosecutor, the initial findings led to favour the criminal hypothesis, given that two fires were observed in two different places on the premises. After more than two hours of intervention, the firefighters managed to bring the fire under control. The Lyon public prosecutor’s office has launched an investigation into “deliberate damage caused by fire”.

On 13 August 2020,18 a few days after the fire at the Bron mosque, the Essalam mosque in Lyon was also burnt down. Here again, the Lyon public prosecutor’s office favoured the criminal hypothesis.

On 2 September 2020, it was the mosque of Tarbes19 that was vandalised by Islamophobic tags and cartoons representing the Prophet Muhammad. Tags such as “Islam Out” were found.

An inhabitant of La Baule (Loire-Atlantique) was sentenced to a 400 euro fine and a citizenship course by the Saint-Nazaire criminal court for his call on Facebook on 17 October to “burn down the mosque”20 in Béziers (Hérault). The day after Samuel Paty’s murder, the man wrote, “You want to pay tribute to him? Go and burn down the mosque of Béziers in order to spread the message that you’re fed up with it.”

Employment

The bill for the reinforcement of Republican principles contains several provisions specifically aimed at public services. Article 121 provides for an extension of religious neutrality to persons delegating public services. This means that the principle of religious neutrality will be extended to a large number of companies such as kindergartens, swimming pools, buses and metro networks, or casinos.

It seems that under the guise of fighting separatism, radicalisation, and communitarianism, the state wants to eliminate any sign of religious affiliation or any manifestation of opinion.

Indeed, on 4 October 2020, Minister of the Interior Gérald Darmanin explained on the radio Europe 1 that this measure would even allow a company to consider as serious misconduct the fact that an employee delegating a public service refuses, for example, to shake the hand of a female colleague.

However, it is not the only employment-related provision covered by this project. Indeed, the Minister Delegate in charge of Citizenship, Marlène Schiappa, recently declared that she wants to create a new charter of secularism to be signed by all associations receiving public subsidies.

Associations legitimately wonder about the purpose of this text in a context where the term “laïcité” (secularism) has “deviated” from its meaning and is used to stigmatise the Muslim community.

In September 2020, the city of Montpellier initiated the process. Mayor Michaël Delafosse (socialist) announced that he would make public subsidies offered to associations conditional on the signature of a seven-point document issued by the government. He explained that this text aims to “fight against the attempts of those who think that the law of faith is superior to that of civil law.”

The compulsory ratification of the charter could lead, as presented by Delafosse and Schiappa, to a major restriction of freedoms on a national scale. It is important to remember that the associations created under the 1901 law are private.

Yet, Eric Vinson, who has a doctorate degree in political science with a focus on secularism, explains that “[i]n France, it is the Republic that is secular, not society. However, associations under the 1901 law are private institutions”. It is, therefore, Muslim organisations or those perceived as such that risk being stigmatised.

Wearing a headscarf is often the main criterion of discrimination experienced by women. A recent study on discrimination against veiled women at work in France was carried out as part of workshops of the Observatory on “Societal and Public Action”. The results of the latter show discrimination towards veiled Muslim women. The study highlights the fact that veiled women are forced to take into account the various polemics on the veil, religion, and separatism in France. A series of semi-directive interviews were conducted with 30 veiled women between 2018 and 2020, using a qualitative method, in order to understand how veiled women integrate and combine their career plans while working with the veil.

The study of this data identified six different career bifurcation strategies: career reorientation, social downgrading, finding a welcoming company, entrepreneurial career, international mobility, and career abandonment. Among men, wearing a beard is often the main criterion of discrimination, but the Council of State has issued a decision that will allow for a clarification of the legal framework.

On 12 February 2020, the Council of State ruled that the beard of a civil servant does not in itself constitute a sign of ostensible manifestation of religious affiliation, not even when the agent is aware of the perception that his beard may provoke among his colleagues and service users.

In 2013, a trainee doctor was asked to trim his beard by the director of the Saint-Denis’s hospital because it was considered a religious sign. The trainee refused and the hospital terminated his agreement in February 2014. After two unfavourable judgments, the doctor whose rights had been infringed, appealed to the Council of State, which in 2020 ruled in his favour. The Council of State, in fact, decided to overturn the Versailles administrative Court of Appeal’s decision and to order Saint-Denis’s Hospital to pay the doctor 3,000 euros.33

This decision is of capital importance since it will help avoid hasty interpretations regarding the wearing of a beard or other signs that may appear religious.

According to the Human Rights Defender, “The prohibition of discrimination based on physical appearance should protect men against a ban on wearing beards at work, whether in the public or private sector.”34

Education

In 2020, in the field of education, Islamophobia manifested itself by a reinforcement or even a diversion of public policies aimed not at French Muslims, but rather at private institutions perceived as such. Some of its manifestations are found in cases of exclusion and harassment of young women for wearing clothes considered too “oriental”, or wearing a veil at university during sports classes.

However, in terms of diverted public policies, France seems to be reoffending. Indeed, the law of 15 March 2004 which, in application of the principle of secularism, regulates the wearing of signs or clothing showing religious affiliation in public schools, middle schools, and high schools was explicit at the time. It was presented as a tool to force recalcitrant pupils to remove their veils, under the threat of disciplinary boards and expulsions. But 16 years later, the record remains the same: this law has neither set back “communitarianism” nor has it favoured access to public education for young women. Moreover, the many debates generated by this law have led to amalgams and, ultimately, have cast opprobrium on French Muslims.35

Public Policies Affecting Freedom of Education

On 10 January 2020,36 the circular issued by the Minister of Justice relating to the protection of secularism and the fight against radicalisation and communitarianism underlined the importance attached to the fight against the so-called school avoidance phenomenon which “paves the way to independent private schools or online teaching, likely to constitute as many vectors fuelling communitarian fractures and future violent extremism.”

While the announcement of this circular seems laudable, the statements made by former Minister of the Interior Castaner on 12 February 2020, during the presentation of the annual report on the law on the fight against terrorism, have only confirmed, if not aggravated, the statements made in the November circular.

Indeed, before the Law Commission, the minister of the interior announced the government’s strategy of resorting to “systematic hindrance”. Systematic hindrance uses the tools provided in the SILT law (Law for the reinforcement of internal security and the fight against terrorism), including the closure of places of worship, home visits, and other legal instruments that make it possible to obstruct activities that are considered disruptive or questionable. Some of the mechanisms include health and safety standards, social security, prefectural administrative measures, and the mobilisation of more than 15,000 private agents for the exercise of certain security measures. Those tools encourage the violation of freedom of religion of French Muslims. The minister of the interior then gave the following figures: “In the last 23 months, 15 mosques, 4 private Muslim schools, 12 religious and associative establishments, and even 152 drinking establishments have been closed down.”

The will to target Muslim establishments is particularly apparent from the remarks made during the hearing of the Senate Committee for the fight against radicalisation whose report was published on 7 July 2020. It is possible to see Daniel Auverlot, Chancellor of the Universities and Rector of the Créteil Academy, saying, “During the 37 inspections that we carried out last year, a report never justified a closure linked to questions of national education. We have used reasons such as the conservation of unsealed food in refrigerators to close down establishments.” (Fig. 1)

Moreover, on 19 February 2020, the Minister for Education Blanquer stated, in response to a question about the number of independent public schools and Muslim schools he had closed:

So first you have the ones you prevent from opening and then you have the ones you close. So, I prevented, for example, last year, 27 schools from opening on the basis of the Gatel Act that we had passed. This is a very important point. And I closed 4 schools last year, and I will be closing more in the next few months. Closing is harder than preventing the opening. (...) Now, we have greater legal means, but it is true that we are in a state of law and therefore there are a certain number of rules to be respected. But I say this to the mayor of Mulhouse, as I do to every mayor in France: “We are at your side in this kind of approach.”

The Gatel Act gives public authorities the possibility to oppose the opening of a private establishment on the basis of the interest of public order. However, the concept of public order in French law suffers from an insufficient conceptualisation, which leads to the possibility of a broad interpretation. Public disorder may be a disturbance of social order, security, public health and tranquillity, public morality or human dignity. The systematic nature of the refusals issued in regard to the opening of private Muslim schools, as established by the abnormally high number of these refusals, indicates that the Ministry for Education is exploiting this broad legal framework to thwart the creation of independent Muslim schools.

On 8 October 2020 in Bobigny, the association Apprendre & Comprendre (Learn & Understand), which offers children the opportunity to learn the Koran, received a decree of closure for a period of one month, notably because it was accused of being a “clandestine school”. The association totally refuted this characterisation. The president of the association refused to sign the order and called on the CCIF to lodge an application for interim measures. At the time of the closure, the ministry’s spokesperson justified the decision by saying, “The girls were veiled and the teachers were all dressed in religious clothing and the Koran was being taught.” This process caused a real uproar on social media.

Indeed, during a television interview, Darmanin admitted having carried out these operations to “get a message across.” “While waiting to change the laws through the project ‘reinforcing Republican principles’, the government is ready to threaten and challenge the rule of law, even if it means demonstrating this drift on an international scale,” he said.

In May 2020, during the Covid-19 pandemic, the Ministry for Education and Youth disseminated a fact sheet entitled “Covid-19 and Sectarian Aberrations”. It states that the civil servants of national education are requested to Identify the situations of pupils at risk of sectarian aberrations. As children are dependent on their environment, attention must therefore be paid to pupils whose legal guardians, followers of certain ideologies or beliefs, are reticent or opposed to the recommendations made in terms of public health: circumventing lockdown for gatherings, refusing treatment, medical examinations or blood tests, etc.

Teachers are thus obliged to report any withdrawal behaviour they witness. These records are of concern because of their infringement of many fundamental freedoms such as freedom of opinion, speech, and religion or belief. In addition, they can be the vehicle for many abusive reports.

The bill aiming at strengthening secularism and reinforcing Republican values puts an end to homeschooling. The bill has conveyed many emotions, reactions, and debates for its various provisions, including the one that aims to end homeschooling.

ing for all children from the age of three (except for medical reasons). Public debates around this article also reveal the willingness of the French government to re-enrol Muslim children in school establishments denying them the opportunity to be homeschooled.

Indeed, Agnes Thill, French MP, said in an interview when asked whether the government is taking advantage of this bill to have greater control over children’s education: “Yes, I think it is taking advantage of this health crisis where people are focused on survival and cannot mobilise. (...) The law against separatism must reinforce Republican principles, and the laudable objective is to fight against the teaching of rigorist Islam. But Article 21 punishes everyone, including those who are totally virtuous with their children, who declare themselves, and accept controls.”

Indeed, the article “establishes the principle of compulsory schooling for all children aged between 3 and 16 in a school establishment at the beginning of the 2021 school year.” Home schooling by parents, which would only concern around 50,000 children, would become the exception if the text is adopted, moving from a simple declaration system to a much more restrictive authorisation system.

Discriminations

It has been noted that discrimination due to the wearing of the headscarf persisted in 2020. During the summer, students at the University of Lille reported the discrimination they suffered from a sports professor. The young women were conditioned access to English boxing classes on the removal of their veil or turban.

In a sound recording, the professor was heard giving discriminatory explanations: “In combat sports, I don’t take women with veil. There are other classes elsewhere, it’s fine if other teachers accept veiled women but I don’t, and I do whatever I want.” In the end, he repeated the words “health” and “safety”.

Although the legal framework is clear in this type of situation, for the University of Lille this case reveals “an error of appreciation on the part of a professor,” explains Nicolas Postel, the University’s First Vice-President. He went on to say, “And it shows that the teachers were clearly not sufficiently equipped to apply the law properly.”

However, we note that it is not possible to qualify this as an error of appreciation, as the record provided by the female students reveals a clear willingness to reject these young women because of their veil. The CCIF explained at the time that this incident was far from being isolated.53

Eventually, a few days after the tribute paid to Samuel Paty, the teacher of Conflans-Sainte-Honorine’s middle school, the Minister for Education hammered the point home on RTL (French radio): when it comes to attacks on secularism, no teacher is unaware of what their superiors expect of them – “No incident should go unreported.”54

As a result, nearly 800 incidents relating to a student body of 12 million have been reported in the margins of this tribute, according to a report released by the Ministry for Education on 3 December. The figures show that among those “situations of violation of the principle of secularism”, 48% of these incidents took place in secondary school, 23% in primary school, 18% in general and technological high school, and 11% in vocational high school. Most of the incidents (90%) were committed by pupils, and around sixty incidents involved parents.55

Massive number of reports are made by schools and illustrate a lack of dialogue, understanding, and a certain psychosis fuelled by the government for the benefit of a society of vigilance and denunciation. It is because of these systematic reports that children found themselves arrested by the police, for comments that they are sometimes not even aware they have made.

As an example, on 5 November, four 10-year-old pupils in Albertville were arrested at their home.56 During the homage to Samuel Paty, the children had reportedly expressed their dissatisfaction in class about the use of cartoons towards the Prophet of Islam by the late teacher. Reported by the school to the authorities, these remarks were qualified as an apology for terrorism and justified four searches, the hearing, and the detention of the children for almost 11 hours. This procedure is justified by the government as “without any disturbance of public order”.

In the south of France, several pupils including two middle school pupils and one high school pupil were taken into police custody - one of them for having said “that they were fed up with flouting Islam.”57

These two examples may raise questions about the excessiveness of the procedures and the force used when dealing with statements made by children of such an early age.

Politics

In 2019, two years after his election and in the wake of a terrorist attack killing 4 police officers, Macron promoted a “society of vigilance”\(^58\) against the “Islamist hydra”, calling for the “automatic reporting” of anyone suspected of “radicalisation”, providing a list of “weak signals” to identify them. Those include growing a beard, the regular and ostentatious practice of ritual prayer, eating halal food, a rigorous religious practice, particularly exacerbated during the month of Ramadan, etc.\(^59\)

In October 2020, Macron announced his plan “against separatism”, which transparently focuses on the political, ideological, theological, and financial control of Muslim communities. This was massively rejected by grassroots organisations and local communities. However, Macron secured the support of the traditional CFCM (French Council for Muslim Faith), by threatening to replace them if they do not comply and do not sign the charter of principles for French Islam.

The plan against separatism includes:\(^60\)

- Mandatory registration and approval of imams by the state.
- Powers granted to local authorities to dissolve Islamic organisations without any legal proceedings.
- Taxing hajj to finance “anti-radicalisation” programmes.
- Prohibition of any non-religious activities for religious organisations.
- Coercive controls on all Islamic organisations (use of sanitary, security, tax, and legal inspections to close organisations which do not support the government).

In October 2020, after the murder of the teacher Samuel Paty, the government exploited the murder for racist purposes. The far right called for revenge. The government followed and designated two organisations as “the enemy of the Republic”: the Collective Against Islamophobia in France (CCIF) and BarakaCity. The government wanted to raid 123 Muslim homes and organisations (56 raids had already been conducted). Minister of Interior Darmanin admitted that those had \(^{59}\) “Un document pour repérer les ‘signaux faibles’ de radicalisation créé une polémique à l’université Cergy” Ouest France 1/10/19.

nothing to do with the assassination of Samuel Paty but were solely conducted to “send a message”.61

The Dissolution of the CCIF and BarakaCity

The Collectif contre l’islamophobie en France (CCIF, Collective Against Islamophobia in France) is a leading human rights organisation, specialised in supporting victims of Islamophobia/anti-Muslim racism, collecting data on Islamophobia in France, and raising awareness about the phenomenon. Created in 2003, the organisation was recognised nationally and had 10,500 members and 15 regional offices. They had supported around 4,000 victims in the last five years and established strong institutional partnerships both nationally (French equality body Défenseur des Droits, CNCDH) and internationally (UN, Council of Europe, European Commission, European Parliament). The CCIF was also active in building cross-group alliances through its membership at ENAR and the French anti-racist platform together with Black, Roma, and Jewish organisations. Civil society organisations like the CCIF are essential in a democratic society, especially as they defend a highly discriminated group by using and promoting peaceful and legal methods.

On 16 October 2020, Samuel Paty, a history teacher at Conflans-Sainte-Honorine middle school, was murdered for showing his students Charlie Hebdo’s cartoons embodying the naked Prophet Muhammad. A father of a student outraged by the teacher’s act posted a video on social networks calling for the resignation or dismissal of Samuel Paty, and also filed a complaint at the police station. After posting the video, the angry parent called the CCIF phone line to explain the teacher’s actions, which he described as Islamophobic, and mentioned the video posted online. The CCIF’s legal assistant then expressly instructed him to remove the video, saying that it would only aggravate the situation and could be turned against him. However, the parent did not remove it. On its part, the CCIF did not open any file.

However, the French government instrumentalised the heinous murder for political purposes and publicly declared on all television channels that the CCIF is the enemy of the Republic and that it is involved in the campaign of harassment that led to the murder of Samuel Paty. The government declared that it wanted to dissolve the CCIF as soon as possible. As a result of these slanderous accusations, tens of thousands of death threats and insults were received by the CCIF on social networks. This outpour of hatred endangered the members of the CCIF who no longer felt safe. However, the CCIF defended itself from the false accusations made against it and its involvement in the murder of Samuel Paty was quickly dismantled by the press. Indeed, the accusations were not based on any factual or legal reality. They were clearly an attempt to criminalise the fight against Islamophobia by exploiting a terrorist act and the national emotion. Under the guise of freedom of expression, the French government wanted to muzzle all speech that called into question its effectiveness or even its involvement in endemic Islamophobia in France. In fact, the CCIF, supported by statistical data it collected every year, did not fail to denounce state Islamophobia. Continuing its fight against “separatism” and “radicalisation”, the government has taken repressive and undemocratic public measures which have had the sole merit of fuelling withdrawal, isolation, and rejection.

After attempting to demonise the CCIF by calling it “an Islamist backroom that does not condemn the attacks”, and implicating it in Paty’s murder, Darmanin was forced to admit publicly that the CCIF was ultimately not involved in the teacher’s murder, but that the government still had the will to dissolve the CCIF, which it considered to be an “enemy of the Republic”. The government, then, no longer hesitated to resort to defamation of the CCIF, which had several times and through several channels condemned the terrorist act as well as those that followed in Nice. Once the procedure had been set in motion and following an initial meeting in the Council of Ministers, the government spokesperson declared that the government was still determined to dissolve the CCIF but considered that this would require substantial legal work. In other words, the government had no tangible legal basis for dissolving the CCIF since the latter had never been condemned or acted illegally. Its sole crime was to denounce Islamophobia in France and especially state Islamophobia, and to defend the rights of French Muslims through French law.

After the long legal work was announced, the government finally sent a notice of dissolution to the CCIF on the grounds of apology for terrorism and public order disturbance. There is no legal basis for the notice and most of the accusations are spurious. In the notice, one can read for example that “the leaders of the association, past and present, are supporters of a radical Islam, in line with the Muslim Brotherhood, whether its successive presidents, its former treasurer, Abdelhakim Séfrioui, founder of the collective Sheikh Yassin, its spokesman Marwan Muhammad, or some leaders of local branches of the CCIF.” Accusations that the CCIF has publicly refuted by explaining that it was not at all linked to the Muslim Brotherhood and that this is not the first time they have publicly attested that this accusation is simply slander. Above all, the CCIF declared that Abdelhakim Séfrioui was neither the treasurer nor an employee, a member, or even an adherent of the CCIF, and that the government undoubtedly confuses the CCIF with the CIF, the “Council of Imams of France”. In their view, this error is evidence of the government’s incompetence or its bad faith. In another of its accusations, the government accuses the CCIF of being both friendly to the Muslim Brotherhood and Salafism, two diametrically opposed movements of which the CCIF is not a member, as it has repeatedly stated. On its social networks, the CCIF dismantled each of the accusations contained in the notice of dissolution. They demonstrated that it was based on unfounded, biased, or misleading elements.

On 26 October, following the violent backlash on social media and the sentiment of physical insecurity felt by its members, the CCIF decided to activate a major plan to deploy a large portion of its activities abroad.64 As a result, the CCIF said that the dissolution notice received on 19 November was not applicable, since it no longer exists as a structure in France. The various actions that were at that time still being implemented were merely related to the liquidation procedure.

On 29 October, the Board of Directors65 announced the voluntary dissolution of the CCIF. They stated that their assets had been transferred to partner associations that will take over the fight against Islamophobia at the European level.

Despite this, with a decree on 2 December, the government decided to dissolve an already dissolved association.

Using the authority under Article L212-1 of the Internal Security Code, the government alleged that the CCIF’s activities provoke or propagate theories tending to encourage or justify discrimination, hate, or violence on the basis of a person or group’s origin, ethnicity, nationality, race, or religion, and that it has engaged in actions aimed at provoking acts of terrorism in France or abroad. The fact that an organisation describes certain counterterrorism measures as Islamophobic should not be equated with spreading or supporting ideas that can give rise to acts of hatred, discrimination, or violence. The reasoning provided in the decree of 2 December suggests that the French government’s decision is based on this misguided and dangerous conflation.

Human Rights Watch, alongside other international and French human rights organisations and lawyers, have found the work of CCIF important in documenting the discriminatory impact of counterterrorism measures.

According to Human Rights Watch,66 the French government’s decision to shut down a leading anti-discrimination group threatens basic human rights and liberties including freedom of expression, association, and religion, and the principle of non-discrimination. “Shutting down an organisation that raises legitimate concerns about anti-Muslim prejudice is blaming the messenger rather than addressing existing discrimination.”67

64. Ibid.
The analysis that can be made of this situation is the government’s clear willingness to keep a tight grip on Islamophobia and to muzzle it. Darmanin repeatedly emphasised that the CCIF was fighting against “state Islamophobia” and that this was unacceptable. The government decided to overstep its rights, using violations of a number of human rights and circumventing the rule of law as explicitly stated on several occasions by several political figures including Darmanin and Estrosi (Nice’s mayor), for political purposes: to muzzle the discourse denouncing structural Islamophobia in France. The CCIF episode is a perfect example of the will and plan of the French government to criminalise Muslims and the fight against Islamophobia. The CCIF has never ceased to present itself as an anti-racist association that promotes human rights, and not as a religious association, and has never ceased to refute this false accusation. However, the CCIF has never ceased to be accused of being Islamist clerics and to be perceived as a religious association. This desire to confuse the two notions illustrates the idea that it is a problem in France to be in charge of an association fighting racism when the people in charge are racialised people.

Consequently, you are no longer judged on your expertise or on what you have denounced, but you are attacked on your sociocultural and religious background; you are no longer an equal actor, but rather an enemy of the Republic. This happened with the CCIF, but the CCIF is not an isolated case. Myriam Pougetoux, Vice-President of UNEF (Union nationale des étudiants de France, National Union of Students of France), was taken to task during her hearing at the National Assembly by deputies who decided to boycott the session because she was wearing a veil.68 The young woman was present to talk about the effects of the Covid-19 crisis on children and youth, but it was not her expertise that was noticed – it was her veil. (Fig. 2)

According to Amnesty International, the dissolution of an organisation is an extreme measure that can be justified only in very limited circumstances. For example, according to European human rights law, a dissolution may be justified in light of a close and direct connection between an organisation and a crime or the engagement of an organisation in activities that constitute an imminent infringement of the rights of others or that fundamentally reject democratic institutions and the rule of law. According to Amnesty International, the dissolution of the CCIF would be a blow to the right to freedom of association and would have a chilling effect for all human rights defenders engaged in combating racism and discrimination. The French authorities have failed to provide to date any evidence that could justify the dissolution of the organisation. Nothing shows that the CCIF is a clear and imminent danger to national security or public order, which could justify its dissolution.

To conclude, French law does not provide for proper due process before the dissolution of associations, which is in violation of human rights standards and can be extremely damaging to civil society and human rights defenders. As the European Human Rights Law points out, the dissolution of an association in Europe is an exceptional restriction of the freedom of association that must always be a measure of last resort, based on strong legal grounds, and compliant with human rights standards. In addition, it must be proven necessary and not target dissent or punish individual actions. If the French government wants to fight terrorism, it cannot conflate it with the policing and criminalisation of Muslims and those who defend their fundamental rights. The French government has an obligation to protect freedom of expression and association in its territory, and must refrain from unlawful measures that effectively deny these rights to a segment of society in the name of protecting these very rights.

Another human rights leading organisation which suffered from the governmental criminalisation of French Muslims is BarakaCity. BarakaCity is a humanitarian and charitable association based on Islamic values, which aims to help the most destitute populations in France and internationally through humanitarian development and social aid operations in France and around the world. BarakaCity participates in the elaboration of sustainable development projects, and conducts research and actions aimed at preventing and halting serious violations of all the rights set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international human rights texts. They are specialised in food emergencies, health crises, medical emergencies, water-related problems (construction of wells, sanitation, repairs, etc.), the care of refugees, reconstruction and rehabilitation of buildings and infrastructure (hospitals, schools, etc.), and the implementation of sustainable projects (agriculture, livestock, industries, etc.).

However, since the start of October 2020, BarakaCity has come under increasing pressure from the government. Its offices were raided by elite security forces. The president of BarakaCity Idriss Sihamedi was arrested and detained on two occasions. The French government publicly declared BarakaCity as an “enemy of the Republic”. Their bank accounts were frozen without any warning. On 28 October, BarakaCity was dissolved before the Council of Ministers.

The decree pronouncing its dissolution reproached it as propagating “ideas advocating radical Islamism”. “Through the personal Twitter account of its president, as well as the association’s Facebook and Twitter accounts, it disseminates and invites the dissemination of hateful, discriminatory and violent ideas,” the decree continued. The lawyers of the NGO announced that they received a mandate to “urgently challenge before the Council of State” the decision of the Council of Ministers.

The president of the association proved that a terrorism investigation had been launched from 2015 to 2019 and it concluded that Idriss Sihamedi had never been linked to any terrorist group. In fact, Sihamedi was targeted by the government following a series of tweets he posted that questioned the integrity of certain political figures. Sihamedi’s tweets (self-described as a “whistle-blower”) were then supported by irrefutable evidence against those targeted. Following the publication of the tweets, the two political figures targeted by the president of the association filed a complaint for harassment. This was followed by a violent search of Sihamedi’s home, where he was assaulted, as evidenced by the photos of his face and home on his Twitter account. (Fig. 3)

BarakaCity’s premises were also searched because the government established a direct link between the isolated acts of the association’s president and the association itself. Based on the assessment of the isolated acts of BarakaCity’s president, and without any causal link between the activities of the individual and the association, the French government, still in the wake of the instrumentalisation of national emotion following the assassination of Samuel Paty, without any strong legal basis dissolved a world-renowned humanitarian association that cleaned up water in poor countries.

Government Crackdown on French Muslims

A repressive Islamophobic public policy implemented on the entire national territory

In 2018, French governance issued a new public policy entitled “systematic hindrance”,76 which aims to prevent acts of terror and the rise of “radicalisation”. From 2018 to late 2019, that method was unofficial, unknown to the public and restricted to specific areas. It was publicly mentioned for the very first time by Christophe Castaner, the former Minister of the Interior, on 12 February 2020, when questioned by the Constitutional Laws Commission. On that day, he announced this method was to be generalised to the entire national territory.

In order to facilitate the general implementation, on 27 November 2019, the government created the Departmental Cells against Islamism and Social Withdrawal, whose purpose is the supervision and application of “systematic hindrance”.

The starting date of the public policy was also unknown until 13 October 2020, when the Minister of the Interior Gérald Darmanin presented an overview of its results.77 From February 2018 to October 2020, 356 “sites” were closed down: public houses, mosques, Islamic schools, and cultural establishments. Moreover, the SILT law, which was established to prevent acts of terror, permitted the temporary closure of 7 mosques from 2018 to February 2020.

Furthermore, Darmanin announced the closure of 73 “sites of radicalisation” in 2020 only. In one month, 650 controls took place. It is necessary to recall that “radicalisation” is a notion which is not clearly defined. The sociological dynamics leading a man or a woman (whatever their religion) to commit violent crimes is still to be fully apprehended and understood. That specific knowledge is still being researched: it is then very unlikely that any state can establish and implement efficient and non-abusive policies based on knowledge which does not exist, or is still being discussed by academics. Moreover, the range of indicators used by state actors only describe peaceful and common Islamic practices. Therefore, it is only a natural conclusion to believe Muslims are targeted because of their Muslimness. The Islamophobic characteristic of the policy objectively derives from the reasoning and thinking process used by the state whilst it established it. Hence, the numbers revealed are thought-provoking: the extremely high cases of closures and controls demonstrate the willingness to harass an entire community or, as the Minister of the Interior stated at a later date, the willingness to “send a message”.

The repercussions of Samuel Paty’s murder

After the horrible murder of Samuel Paty, an already difficult situation has been aggravated. The terrible act strengthened the state in its methodology, rather than creating a will to understand its errors. Instead of establishing an atmosphere of comprehension and calmness, extreme actions have been undertaken.

In a primary school in Albertville (Savoie), 4 Muslim children aged 10 were questioned and held in a police station for more than 10 hours, accused by their teacher of condoning the murder and, therefore, of having indulged in making apologies for terrorism.

The state closed down the Pantin Mosque accusing it of having a role in the murder since the latter had notably relayed on its Facebook page a video denouncing Samuel Paty’s course on the cartoons of the Prophet Mohamed. The state also dissolved a major humanitarian NGO, BarakaCity, considering that “the incriminated remarks of the president of the association can be attributed to the association itself and constitute speech inciting discrimination, hatred or violence, which can justify dissolution.” Indeed, the Council of State confirmed the dissolution of the humanitarian association BarakaCity and the closure of the Pantin mosque on 25 November 2020. In both cases, the judge of the Council of State rejected the requests for suspension.

In addition, the independent Muslim school Meo High School in Paris 19e was closed while the board insured that it complied with the rules of the French national education system. It is difficult to see this new closure as a mere “coincidence”. Indeed, its closure took place when the bill “reinforcing Republican principles” was presented to the Council of Ministers on Wednesday, 9 December 2020, one of the key educational measures of which concerns the reinforced supervision of private schools (1,700 structures, 85,000 pupils). The Police Headquarters and the Paris Public Prosecutor’s Office announced, in a joint communiqué, the closure in the following words: “It is a high school with ‘Muslim ethics’. Since its opening in 2015, it has been subject to four administrative controls, which have highlighted its community roots”. The school had been on the radar of the departmental unit for the fight against Islamism and community withdrawal for some time, without specifying the factual reproaches made to this establishment.

A prayer room in Thiers (Puy-de-Dôme) and eight other prayer rooms and mosques were closed, including eight for administrative reasons, according to the Minister of the Interior Darmanin, before the start of the parliamentary debate on the bill “reinforcing Republican principles”. He added, “Of the 18 places of worship which were under particular surveillance at my request, 9 were able to be closed.”

These statements demonstrate that all means are being used to close down places of worship or other places with any kind of connection to the Muslim community. Indeed, in his statements on Twitter Darmanin states that he is taking "determined action against Islamist separatism." (Fig. 4) Nevertheless, it is still important to note that we are faced with a new demonstration of "systematic hindrance" as eight of these places have been closed for administrative reasons.84

Islamophobic Political discourses

Islamophobia can be described as a political phenomenon which has become part of French governance. In other words, it cannot be exclusively correlated to a specific political party: the narratives expressed are widely shared by the entire political spectrum. Hence, the ideological consensus leads to the implementation of discriminatory public policies. Islamophobic discourses ultimately become normative.

In February 2020, the ex-Minister of the Interior Christophe Castaner was heard by a Parliament Commission. He was asked to report on the application of a law voted in 2017, which aims to prevent acts of terror. During his hearing, Castaner highlighted the plan applied by his administration to prevent radicalisation and violent extremism, and the results obtained in the last 23 months. The plan was entitled "Systematic Hindrance". Here are some extracts of his hearing:85

In particular, I would like to stress that I have asked prefects and law enforcement agencies to step up their action in the fight against radicalisation and to make it a priority. In this respect, fifteen priority neighbourhoods have been identified and all the incubators of hatred that we could find have been tracked down. We have achieved promising results, and we must now extend them. This is why I have asked that the measures put in place, and the so-called systematic hindrance method deployed in these neighbourhoods, be generalised to the whole territory. This plan led to the closure of 152 drinking establishments, 15 places of worship - including 2 under the SILT law -, 4 schools, and 12 religious, and associative establishments.86

Since radicalisation (which has not been defined scientifically) is established through a range of indicators describing peaceful and common Islamic practices,

86. Ibid.
“systematic hindrance” must be understood as a plan sanctioning Muslim individuals (as well as legal entities run by Muslims) because of their Muslimness.

On 18 February, President Macron gave a speech on “Islamist Separatism”, a non-demonstrated sociological and political phenomenon he described in these words. 87

This is why our enemy is, in this respect, separatism, that is to say this phenomenon we witnessed for decades which is a will to leave the Republic, to no longer respect its rules, a movement of withdrawal which, because of beliefs and belonging, aims to leave the Republican field, and that is not acceptable.

The following day, Minister for Education Jean-Michel Blanquer, answering a journalist’s question regarding the number of Muslim private schools closed by the government, announced his refusal to open 27 schools and the closing of 4 existing schools.

These three political discourses, by the head of the state and two ministers, announced the renewed willingness of the state to reshape the everyday life of the Muslim community. Moreover, it highlighted how the public policies adopted were driven by a strong securitarian and restrictive approach to the religious freedom of an entire minority.

Nevertheless, some political actors believed these announcements were not nearly enough, demonstrating their blind and almost fanatical approach to the issues regarding Muslim’s religious freedom. Marine Le Pen, head of the far-right party, wrote a letter to the minister of the interior after an imam in Lyon performed the Islamic call to prayer during the pandemic as a gesture of national solidarity and support (churches rang their bells for the Annunciation the same day). She expressed her disapproval in these terms:

We are thus witnessing a new escalation in the illegal occupation of the public domain by groups that seek to seize every opportunity to reject the principles of laicism of our Republic and thus openly defy the Republican state. 88

Gérard Darmanin was appointed as minister of the interior on 6 July 2020. Two days later, he addressed the National Assembly defining “political Islam” as “a mortal enemy to the Republic”. 89 He tried to define radicalisation in August as “a sectarian excess of religion”. He outlined how “France represented the promotion of a secularised Islam”, demonstrating once again the state’s willingness to reshape the beliefs

89. “Pour Gérald Darmanin, l’islam politique est ‘un ennemi mortel pour la République’”, Ouest France, 08/07/20.
and teachings of Islam. Marlène Schiappa, delegated minister, discussed the future Anti-Separatism Law on 13 September. She declared how the state’s struggle against separatism was not only a legal issue, but also a “cultural struggle.”

On 2 October, Emmanuel Macron finally announced the dispositions included in the Anti-Separatism Law. Here are some extracts of his speech, entitled “The Republic in Action”.

The problem is Islamist separatism. It is a conscious, theorised, politico-religious project, which takes the form of repeated deviations from the values of the Republic, which often results in the constitution of a counter-society and whose manifestations are the dropping out of school of children, the development of communities sporting and cultural practices which are the pretext for teaching principles that do not conform to the laws of the Republic. It is indoctrination and through it, the negation of our principles, equality between women and men, human dignity. The problem is this ideology, which asserts that its own laws are superior to those of the Republic.

As we said, Islamophobic discourses should never be seen as a mere electoral communication with limited concrete applications. The year started with the announcement of the strengthening of a severe and freedom-destroying public policy, namely “systematic hindrance”, along with the classical “war on terror” narrative. The state, through its different bodies and representatives, tried to convince the public of its fundamental interest in fighting extremism and terror, and of its efficiency in doing so.

Covid-19 exacerbating Islamophobia

From March to April 2020, the overcrowding of mortuaries in France with bodies of deceased Muslims who had died from the Covid-19 virus was commonplace. As a result, Muslim officials sounded the alarm about the lack of Muslim areas in communal cemeteries. The Covid-19 pandemic highlighted a problem that had not been sufficiently addressed. Previously, 80% of French Muslims preferred to bury their deceased in their country of origin, regardless of its location (Sub-Saharan Africa, Maghreb, etc.). Nevertheless, the closure of airspace and the suppression of international flights put a brutal end to this practice.

In a press release dated 13 April, the French Council of the Muslim Faith (CFCM) called for “urgent intervention by the public authorities” and asked the mayors in charge of managing the cemeteries to take “responsibility for the suffering and pain of those families who have lost a loved one and who find themselves in great difficulty burying their dead.”95 (Fig. 5)

According to CFCM figures, there are about 300 Muslim areas in cemeteries in France, each with about 100 places. On 23 April 2020, during an audio conference, the CFCM asked Macron to create new spaces.96

Mayors such as those of the cities of Gennevilliers or Mantes-la-Jolie97 have enlarged the pre-existing Muslim areas in cemeteries, others have undertaken to do so, and yet others such as Dominique Baert, mayor of Wattrelos, categorically refuse to create such sites. Indeed, the latter was approached by the Human Rights League (LDH) of Roubaix for the creation of a Muslim area in one of the cemeteries of Wattrelos, but he firmly opposed it, explaining that it is “a non-case”.98

The Muslim community in France thus found itself confronted with a double pain: the loss of loved ones, to which were added the difficulties, if not the impossibility, of carrying out religious funeral rites or simply burying the deceased.

The other discriminatory element that arose during the Covid-19 crisis in 2020 was the management of religious holidays. Indeed, on 4 May 2020, the former prime minister declared, “I had indicated that it would be necessary to wait until 2 June for services and prayers in places of worship to open again to believers. Many worshippers have made proposals to reconcile the conduct of their meetings with the demands of physical distancing. I know, in particular, that the period from 29 May to 1 June corresponds, for several cults, to feasts or important stages in the religious calendar. This is why, if the health situation does not deteriorate during the first weeks of the lifting of the lockdown, the government is prepared to study the possibility of religious services resuming in 29 May.”

Indeed, it is surprising that the government did not consider the celebration of Eid (a religious celebration of the Muslim faith) which should have been celebrated less than a week (the weekend of 24 May 2020) before the celebration of Pentecost.

However, a cross-reading of the judge’s decision in the context of an appeal by several Christian authorities on 11 May 2020 against the CCIF’s appeal on 22 May 2020, i.e. only 10 days later, raises questions as to the differential treatment by the court toward the different religions.

Indeed, in the context of the appeal by the Christian bodies seeking the amendment of the government provisions prohibiting assembly and meetings in places of worship, the judge ordered the government “to amend, within eight days of notification of this order, pursuant to Article L. 3131-15 of the public Health Code, Provision III of Article 10 of Decree No. 2020-548 of 11 May 2020, by taking measures strictly proportionate to the health risks incurred and appropriate to the circumstances of time and place applicable at the start of the deconfinement, to regulate gatherings and meetings in places of worship.”

However, when it comes to the legal proceedings launched by the CCIF, the urgency is rejected by the judge, who only retains the declarations of the CFCM to reject the urgency. The latter had affirmed “its appeal to the Muslims of France to watch over the last nights of Ramadan in our homes” then declared that “given the health situation in our country, the resumption of religious ceremonies in the mosques, which must be gradual, cannot take place on the occasion of large gatherings such as Eid or Friday prayers.”

Therefore, on reading these two decisions, it is easy to see that the word of the Muslim community is ignored in favour of that of the CFCM, a body which the majority of Muslims in France do not recognise, and that two different religious holidays taking place less than a week apart are treated significantly differently by the court.

The issues of cemeteries and religious celebrations are not the only problems that have risen during the pandemic. Others have simply been exacerbated.

Indeed, the pre-existing inequalities within working-class neighbourhoods were aggravated and deepened by the Covid-19 pandemic. The department of Seine-Saint-Denis is the poorest department of France and has a very large Muslim population, perhaps the largest in France. The latter was the most affected by the pandemic with a mortality rate of +130% between 1 March and 27 April 2020. This very high mortality rate can be explained by a department that is much less medically equipped than others, inevitably leading to unequal access to healthcare.

Beyond the lack of information on government health measures linked to a digital divide that is present in these neighbourhoods, the population living in Seine-Saint-Denis is the population most exposed to the risk of contamination because it provides the necessary goods and services during the lockdown. Indeed, it should be noted that a large number of healthcare workers, garbage collectors, supermarket employees, housekeepers, delivery staff, and workers are Muslims that come from Seine-Saint-Denis. These people, whose activities do not allow them to work from home, have had no other choice but to continue to run the French economy by going to work, being in contact with a large public, and thus allowing the more privileged to access what they need.102

Camille Polloni, a journalist at Mediapart, stated in this respect that “the causes of this over-representation of minorities among serious cases and deaths due to coronavirus are multiple and interrelated, but for the most part already known. They have little to do with genetic factors, but much to do with the socio-economic status of racialised people in the countries concerned. People from ethnic minorities are highly represented among the lowest paid occupations involving permanent contact with the public. They are more likely to live in dense urban areas, sometimes in overcrowded housing. As the American cardiologist Clyde W. Yancy writes, a combination of factors deprived African Americans of the ‘privilege’ of being able to stop working or to do so at a distance, withdraw from social life and limit their contacts.”103

Affected by a higher mortality rate and greater economic insecurity, these neighbourhoods are also targeted by the police.

On 23 April, in an interview with RMC, Castaner stated that 220,000 checks had been carried out in Seine-Saint-Denis, i.e. “more than double the national average”. The newspaper Libération also published data from the Ministry of the Interior indicating that the rate of fines in the same department is three times higher than the national average, 17% compared to 5.9%.\footnote{Emmanuel Fansten, “Confinement: en Seine-Saint-Denis, un taux de verbalisation trois fois plus important qu’ailleurs”, Libération, 26/04/2020, https://www.liberation.fr/france/2020/04/26/confinement-en-seine-saint-denis-un-taux-de-verbalisation-trois-fois-plus-important-qu-ailleurs_1786462, (Access date: 22/01/2021).}

Tension then rises in the suburbs where “targeted and violent police checks” have been taking place every day since the beginning of the lockdown. In fact, a multitude of inhabitants of working-class suburbs denounced police violence, with supporting videos, during checks.

On 19 March, in Aubervilliers in Seine-Saint-Denis, the young Ramatoulaye, a 19-year-old veiled woman, was controlled by the police after running some errands.

She declared, “I showed them my handwritten certificate and the eight policemen made fun of me.” The tone quickly escalated and “degrading” insults started flying. Luckily, a neighbour filmed the scene from his window in which a policeman is seen using his taser for no apparent reason. The young woman collapsed and tried to get up again and was then violently pinned to the ground. (Fig. 7) The young woman was taken away and placed in a cell for one hour. Following the violence, she was given 5-day medical leave from a doctor.

\end{figure}
On 23 March 2020, one week after the beginning of the lockdown in France, Yassin, 30 years old, posted a video. “They smashed my head twice against the wall and hit me with a Flash-Ball.” (Fig. 8)

These two testimonies are only the visible tip of the iceberg of systemic discrimination practiced by the police since long before the start of the pandemic. This discrimination, however, has been exacerbated by the lockdown triggered by the health crisis.

Former Defender of Rights (Ombudsman) Jacques Toubon denounced the “systemic discrimination” practiced by the police just before the end of his mandate.

Indeed, a landmark decision taken by the Defender of Rights in 2020 recognises and describes systemic discrimination and discriminatory harassment in relation to repeated acts of checks, searches, abuse, racist insults, arbitrary detention, etc. by police officers against “the undesirable people” (in the words of the police) in Paris (12th arrondissement).

For Michel Kokoreff, professor of sociology at the University of Paris-VIII-Vincennes-Saint-Denis, the police cultivate a form of impunity in working-class neighbourhoods, even more visible during the pandemic.

Media

Two days after the beginning of the lockdown, i.e. 19 March 2020, Eric Zemmour, a French polemicist and racist, declared on French television that according to an “official” source, the measures of social distancing would not be respected by “Africans” who, at the sight of a revolt against the police, shouted, “It’s a white man’s disease, we are protected by Allah.”

The correlations made by people between Muslims and Covid-19 continue. On 11 May 2020, Professor Pascal Astagneau, infectologist at the Pitié Salpêtrière Hospital answered the question “Is spitting in the street dangerous for others?” by saying, “Then, of course, there are stories related to religious rites, Ramadan for example...” referring to the urban legend that says that Muslim cannot swallow their saliva during Ramadan.

This year again, the media tried to steer public opinion through a strong stigmatisation of Muslims on unfounded issues and by making far-fetched correlations. They covered up priority issues behind polemical and discriminatory topics based on false information. They manipulated information by showing non-compliance with measures advocated during the deconfinement by showing videos of young people from precarious neighbourhoods, but at the same time not showing the quays of the Seine or the crowded parks in Paris.

To date, it is very important to note that there is no independent body in charge or capable of regulating hate speech on French television channels. The Conseil Supérieur de l’Audiovisuel, the watchdog for television channels, is seeing reports multiply, but its credibility is diminishing due to the lightness of its warnings. It has no deterrent effect, which leaves the entire field open for media to outbid each other in the dissemination of hate.

Justice System

The bill aiming at strengthening secularism and reinforcing Republican principles was presented to the Council of Ministers on 9 December 2020. The Minister of Interior presented a multidisciplinary approach and recommended the implementation of the following measures:

• The neutrality of public services, even when they are provided by private individuals, by giving the public authorities the means to act when it is not respected. This bill would therefore make it possible to enshrine in legislation obligations related to the neutrality of private law agents entrusted with a public service mission. In addition, it would provide the means for the delegator to enforce the delegate’s obligations of neutrality. For example, a prayer room within the premises of a private body, whether a delegate or a public service provider, would therefore be prohibited.

- The notion of “Republican deficiency” which allows the prefect to suspend the decisions or actions of a local organism that seriously disregards the neutrality of the public service, under the supervision of the administrative judge (examples: schedules in swimming pools, selection of books in municipal libraries). This would result in extending neutrality to users of public services.

- To ensure that associations benefiting from public funding and resources respect Republican principles and values, and intend to fight more effectively against associations that “disregard” the laws of the Republic. The bill plans to broaden the grounds for the dissolution of these associations in the Council of Ministers. It also provides for combatting separatism by putting an end to homeschooling for all children from the age of three (except in the case of medical reasons), as well as strengthening the supervision of independent private schools (teaching content, staff career paths, funding). The bill thus strengthens measures that already existed unofficially under the guise of monitoring health, safety, and other legal mechanisms targeting mainly Muslim schools.

- To go back on the principles of the law of 9 December 1905 for the organization of religions by reinforcing the supervision of religious associations through the application of new obligations such as the “labelling of imams” by the CFCM. The provisions in terms of policing of religions will be strengthened to protect places of worship from any action and/or dissemination of ideas and/or remarks hostile to the laws of the Republic.

On 1 November, Darmanin announced that the offense called “separatism” may include a 5-year jail sentence and 75,000 euro fines for patients who refuse to be treated by a doctor of the opposite gender. However, a patient’s free choice of doctor is enshrined in the Code of Ethics (Article 6).

It is important to recall that the obligation of neutrality does not prohibit freedom of conscience and worship, it only prohibits a public agent from manifesting their religious opinions in the course of their duties. The obligation of neutrality applies to all public services, including those provided by a legal person under private law. However, the European Court of Human Rights specifies that the obligation of neutrality must not disproportionately interfere with the freedom of conscience and religion of public agents.\footnote{European Court of Human Rights “Affaire EBRAHIMIAN c. France” https://www.gouvernement.fr/sites/default/files/contenu/piece-jointe/2015/11/affaire_ebrahimian_c_france.pdf, 26/11/15.}
Furthermore, making the payment of public aid for associations conditional on the signature of a contract of commitment to respect the values of the Republic and the minimum requirements of life in society infringes the freedom of assembly and association provided for in Article 12 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and Article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The educational aspect introduced in the bill entails a de facto breach of Article 2 of the First Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights allowing parents to educate their children in accordance with their religious and philosophical convictions; Article 5 of the UN Declaration of 25 November 1981; and Articles 14 and 18 of the International Convention on the Rights of the Child, adopted by the United Nations.

Lastly, the strengthening of religious associations and state interference in the exercise of religion inevitably leads to a violation of the freedom of association provided for in Article 12 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, and of the freedom of thought, conscience, and religion provided for in Article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights and in amending Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Human Rights Committee, in its General Comment No. 22: Article 18 (right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion), observes that the performance of religious rites and practices includes such customs as observance of food prohibitions, wearing religious clothing or head coverings, and participation in rites of passage and the use of a religious language. Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights protects traditional ways of life. Furthermore, it recalls that most of the population shall not adopt discriminatory measures which restrict, in a special way, the practice of minority religions.

Moreover, President Macron announces a true project for society in which any deviation of conscience, deviating from the philosophical principles adopted by the elite in place, can be legally prohibited or administratively repressed. Thus, several establishments (mosques, private Islamic schools) have already been subject to violent administrative searches. It is indeed the conscience and the way of life of a whole religious minority, which is today the object of state persecution.

On 10 January, the Minister of Justice released her circular on the protection of laïcité (secularism) and the fight against radicalisation and communitarianism.115 The circular is the continuity of that of the Minister of the Interior dated 27 November 2019, the purpose of which is to fight against Islamism and against the variious attacks on Republican principles. Following the files gathered by public prosecutors’ offices, the minister affirms in her circular the existence of a form of identity withdrawal as well as the development of communitarianism which would threaten social cohesion in certain territories of the Republic. She mentions the implementation of plans to combat radicalisation in the suburbs. With a view to combatting communitarianism, the minister emphasises the importance of combatting so-called school avoidance phenomena (mentioned in the education section of this report). She describes the latter as vectors that can lead to communitarian fractures or violent extremism.

The comments made by the Minister of Justice in her circular are worrying since they are based on the dangers of notions that are too vague and insufficiently conceptualised. Indeed, the notions of “radicalisation”, “communitarianism”, and “separatism” are poorly and dangerously defined. The notion of “separatism”, for example, has been constantly used by the government since the beginning of 2020, along with the adjective “Islamist”, which therefore refers to a particular religion. However, the notion of “Islamist separatism” also raises the question of its meaning and the risks of stigmatisation that it entails. Nowadays, the word “Islamist” is used in France to denigrate someone and to bring them down out of hatred, ignorance, or political shenanigans.

Following the various polemics on the subject and the transparent stigmatisation of a religion and its followers by laws and public policies, the adjective “separatist” was gradually abandoned in France. Nevertheless, the aim of this circular and of the various texts remains the same and continues to stigmatise French Muslims. It is ironic to read the Minister of Justice describing situations of identity withdrawal or social isolation of Muslim citizens from suburbs when many studies and anti-racist associations have warned of the very consequences that this type of public policy can have on Muslim citizens. These consequences include the withdrawal and isolation of a social group that feels persecuted by its own government through media hype, anti-Islamic propaganda, and openly Islamophobic legal texts.

A large number of organisations regularly warn public authorities about the dangers the counter-radicalisation and counter-terrorism plans pose for minority populations. The Special UN Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, Fionnuala Ni Aolá, several times alerted the French government to the discriminatory effects and human rights violations caused by the implementation of anti-terrorist measures.

Internet

On 18 February 2020, the website of the newspaper Marianne published an article entitled “Islam: Letter Alerting Macron to Which He Never Replied”. The article explains the contents of a letter signed by a number of personalities and handed to President Macron in person to alert him to “the dangers of organising Islam in France ‘from above’, as such a structure is almost inevitably doomed to fall into the hands of supporters of political Islam.” The letter contained paragraphs such as “This secessionist Islam is itself diverse, riddled with internal rivalries, yet united by a literal reading of the Koran and by its hegemonic ambitions. It is the Islam of violent jihadists, but also of Salafism and the Muslim Brotherhood, of Wahhabism and the Islamic World League, of Milli Görüs and Ditib, of Tablígh. No accommodation will satisfy them. Any concession will only convince them of our weakness and encourage them to demand more and more.”

During the lockdown and in particular from 24 March 2020 onwards, a large number of fake news spread on the web with the aim of dividing communities. In a fake news post published on a far-right Twitter account, one could read, “Humiliation of France and the French in #Lyon: While the churches have been closed, manu militari, the mosques remain open.”

In reality, places of worship – such as churches, mosques, and synagogues – “are allowed to remain open” in France, but “any gathering or meeting within them is prohibited with the exception of funeral ceremonies within the limit of 20 people” according to a decree of 23 March published in the Bulletin officiel (Official Journal).120

These false allegations directly targeting places of worship have no other objective than to divide French citizens, regardless of their faith. However, during the pandemic, online hatred has reached a rarely seen level to the point of rejoicing at the death of others.

Indeed, while the large number of deaths during the first wave of Covid-19 was an international shock, some people drew attention by the symbolism of their role during this crisis. This is the case of Aïcha, 52 years old, a cashier at Saint-Denis and a member of the General Labour Confederation. Aïcha died by Covid-19. Her colleagues saluted “a great woman with a great heart”. She was one of those workers on the front line who provide for the needs of the most privileged who were able to work from home and to isolate themselves fully in accordance with the recommended government measures. She was the first Covid-19 victim within the Carrefour group.121

Following numerous publications made to pay tribute to her, hateful comments such as “One less Aïcha, yaaay !!!!!!!” were also published. (Fig. 10)

122. Comment by “Lily Terhal”, Facebook, 27/02/2020, (Access date: 19/12/20).
However, although on social networks Islamophobic hatred is often expressed anonymously, in a sneaky way, there are times when detractors do not bother to hide their identity and intentions or even to think about the consequences of their words on their professional position.

Indeed, it was possible to read the hateful remarks of an elected representative of the town of Haguenau. In a public post published on his Facebook account, Christian Steinmetz, allowed himself some Islamophobic hate speech. Steinmetz declared, speaking of the women wearing headscarves he saw when he went to the pharmacy, “At the beginning of the afternoon I went to the pharmacy to look for medicine for my mother, on the way back I saw four veiled Fatma with the kids in the street.” Under this post, his friends openly called out to violence. “You should have eliminated them all at once,” wrote Marc while Laurent commented “I have weapons in case Christian!!! If they don’t understand it differently.” Both comments were liked by the elected representative, tacitly validating his friends’ recommendations.123 (Figs. 11 and 12)

This behaviour on the part of an elected representative is more than worrying and alarming, and highlights the trivialisation of Islamophobic hatred that is particularly present on the Internet, as a place that is too poorly regulated and where individuals think they can act with impunity.

In a tweet, the executive director of the NGO Human Rights Watch, Kenneth Roth, made a remark that did not leave notorious Islamophobes unmoved. He retweeted an article from the Washington Post and wrote the following caption: “Can Islamophobia be any more transparent? The French government mandates masks but still bans the burqa”. (Fig. 13) Indeed, between the mandatory wearing of the mask, which therefore no longer shows the face except for the eyes, and the wearing of the niqab, prohibited in France by the law of 2010, there is a lot to question.125

Furthermore, it is important to note that women wearing the veil today combined with the mask due to the pandemic, are similar to the ones wearing the niqab and that there has been no disturbance of public order regarding this issue, no problem of identification since the mask has to be lowered when necessary (just as a niqab could be). The implementation of a long-term state of health emergency proves that the exception has become, for now, the general rule.

A promoter of a multicultural society, the French professor of political science at the University College London Philippe Marlière makes the same observation: “Read the Washington Post and point out the schizophrenia of the government: a woman wearing the niqab must remove it and pay a fine. From 11 May, she must remove it and immediately cover her face with a mask, otherwise she will have to pay another fine!”127 (Fig. 14)

Islamophobic discourse online is leading to an increase in negative prejudices against Muslims. The use of fake news is becoming commonplace, as if the driving force behind the information were anti-Muslim hatred. Polemics emerge at times when the whole world is supposed to come together, but the omnipresence of these messages is deliberately divisive. Through these various manifestations of hatred there is a desire to create a “Muslim problem”.

5) Among other controversies, the CFCM has formally approved a “Charter of Principles” for Islam in France. This text paves the way for the creation of a National Council of Imams, responsible for “labelling” imams practising in France.135 In this way, they participate in silencing and controlling Islam as planned by the French government, which is trying to eradicate the Muslim religion in favour of a model devised by the French state. The charter represents a threat to Muslims globally. It builds a foundation for racist and rights violations against them. It sets a dangerous precedent that threatens the presence of Islam/Muslims in Europe. It’s a basis for the target of any faith minority community in the world.

In 2020, a number of citizens’ initiatives were put in place to combat Islamophobia in France. During the overt Muslim crackdown set up by the French government, including the dissolution of two leading human rights organisations, international civil society did not retreat but joined forces to denounce strongly the authoritarian excesses of the French state towards its Muslim citizens.

This is how the international coalition against Islamophobia was born, which brings together more than sixty international associations whose primary objective is to prepare plans and strategies to fight against state Islamophobia in France and to put an end to abuses against French Muslims.

To this end, several campaigns have been set up in the form of working groups under the aegis of the British association CAGE. A tweetstorm campaign was set up on Twitter with the hashtag #StopMacron, which was the #1 trend in Austria, Switzerland, and Germany, and #4 trend in the UK.

The associations of the coalition mobilised to seize the international press and denounce the situation of Muslims in France, which as a result gave international visibility to the numerous violations of Muslim rights by the government and put some pressure on Macron who was forced to justify himself on Al Jazeera and to censor some newspapers like the Financial Times by finding supposed factual flaws, as in the article by Mehreen Khan “Macron’s War on Islamic Separatism Only Divides France Further”. The launch of an international boycott of French products also pushed Macron to defend himself and his public policies in the international press.

The other notable action by this coalition is the filing of a complaint at the UN denouncing the Islamophobic public policies of the French government and its persecution of Muslims. For this action, no less than 36 NGOs from 13 countries signed the complaint to the UN Human Rights Council.

137. “Tackle French ‘Abuse’ of Muslims, Civil Society Groups Tell UN”, Al Jazeera, 18/01/21,
Speaking to Anadolu Agency, Managing Director of the UK-based CAGE Advocacy Group Muhammad Rabbani said the French government’s policies have led to the “securitisation” of Muslim life and the shutdown of their places of worship, charities, and NGOs. “In the last few days, the French Interior Minister has closed down another nine mosques. France is attempting to export its model of Islamophobia across the EU,” he said. According to Rabbani, “France is arguably the testing laboratory for European Islamophobia. It is, therefore, crucial that it is challenged robustly and in an organized fashion, so it does not expand beyond the French borders.”

The press covered the initiative and the coalition called upon the UN to ensure that France upholds and enforces the UN Universal Declaration/International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (UDHR/ICCPR) and every directive on the prohibition of discrimination and racism. The coalition also urges France to enact or rescind legislation where necessary to prohibit any such discrimination and to “take all appropriate measures to combat intolerance on the grounds of religion in this matter.”

Another consortium of European Civil Society Organizations (CSOs) including ENAR, Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, etc. undertook actions in European institutions to denounce the crackdown on French Muslims and the discriminatory public policies. They published press releases, recommendations, and have been advocating to political figures such as Commissioner for Equality Helena Dalli, European Commission Vice-President Vera Jourova, and many MEPs to convince them to take a stance denouncing the Islamophobic actions of French government.

The group “Fighting Islamophobia” is a Facebook group that was set up in 2018. Its primary purpose was to report hateful content against Muslims on the social network Facebook. The group has removed hundreds of profiles, groups, and pages from the Facebook social network with the sole intention of stirring up hatred against Muslims. Then, in 2020, due to the oppressive context towards French Muslims, the members of this group started writing and reacting to the political and media treatment of Muslims. They agreed that together they had the capacity and sufficient skills to counterbalance these denigrating and stigmatising discourses. Thus, the participatory media “CALAM” was born in 2020.

In the form of an association, the members have given themselves the mission to offer information in an objective way, as close as possible to reality and without sensationalism, on the current events of the French Muslim community. CALAM’s members intend to deconstruct certain xenophobic and/or Islamophobic discourses that are now firmly rooted in the collective imagination, produce counter-discourses, and produce articles and video reports promoting the integration of Muslims in France by highlighting their contribution to economic and civic life. CALAM hopes to become a real force on social networks quickly in order to make the voice of Muslims and all minorities oppressed by President Macron and his government heard.

Conclusion and Policy recommendations

The year 2020 marks a turning point in Islamophobia in France, which is more ingrained than ever in institutions, political and media discourse, and public policy and collective consciousness. The future of the fight against Islamophobia in France looks unpromising if no civil organisation capable of collecting real data on Islamophobia and protecting the rights of French Muslims by combatting Islamophobic discrimination and violence - such as the CCIF - takes up the torch that has been unjustly withdrawn.

Our recommendations are numerous and do not only concern the French government but also international institutions. We call for actions that would adequately respond to the crisis and tackle the structural manifestations of Islamophobia by mainstreaming it in key policy areas. Some of these recommendations are the results of a collective reflection from a coalition of civil society organisations that fight Islamophobia.

We ask for France to

1. Recognise Islamophobia as a specific form of racism and fight it adequately in all spheres.
2. Stop criminalising Muslim individuals, establishments, and associations that fight Islamophobia using public policies and political discourses. Abandon the bill against separatism since it overly targets and criminalises French Muslims.
3. Appoint an efficient watchdog organ to monitor hate speech and particularly hate speech towards Muslims on television.
4. Appoint an independent organ to measure the impact of counter-terrorism legislation and the upcoming bill against separatism on Muslim citizens.
5. Thoroughly define the notions of radicalisation, separatism, and communitarianism, and stop using them to create blurring and confusion as well as the stigmatisation and marginalisation of French Muslims.
6. Diminish the dark figure of Islamophobia by implementing a relation of trust between Muslim citizens and the police, and by training police officers, teachers, and civil servants on the notions of Islamophobia, discrimination, and hate crime.

7. Allow ethnic profiling statistics to determine the real characteristics of Islamophobia and racism, and to measure its intersectional impact.

8. Secure mosques and religious centres.

We ask for European institutions to

9. Ensure that funding programmes have specific allocation criteria to benefit Muslim people (or those perceived as such) and civil society organisations supporting them, so that they can develop long-term projects for victim support, capacity building, strategic litigation, educational programmes, etc. This should be included in the current EU budget negotiations.

10. Ensure that the new recovery instrument Next Generation EU include measures that address the specific situation of Muslim communities, especially in the REACT-EU (Recovery Assistance for Cohesion and the Territories of Europe) which targets the socio-economic impacts of the Covid-19 pandemic, in line with the objectives of an inclusive and fair recovery for all. The process for the disbursement of funds should involve Muslim communities in consultative mechanisms with the governments.

11. Explore the possibility to initiate infringement proceedings based on the Employment Directive (2000/78/EC) to address the systemic discrimination faced by Muslim women wearing the headscarf in certain EU member states.

12. Assess the restrictions of freedom of religion and belief in the upcoming revised Strategy on the Charter of Fundamental Rights and adopt recommendations for member states.

13. Assess and acknowledge the discriminatory impact of counter-radicalisation and counter-terrorism measures, and ensure that counter-terrorism measures comply with fundamental rights safeguards, especially when implementing the recently adopted EU counter-terrorism directive.

We ask for Member states to

14. Support the adoption or improvement of national policies against racism, such as National Action Plans against Racism, with specific measures or strategies to recognise and counter Islamophobia as a form of racism.

15. Develop and promote harmonisation of data collection in areas of hate crime and equality, including and systematically recognising anti-Muslim bias as a category. These data should be disaggregated by multiple grounds of discrimination (including gender, race, ethnicity, and religion) while respecting self-identification and full anonymity. This is central to assess the disproportionate impact of Covid-19 on Muslims and design tailored responses and policies, particularly in the forthcoming recovery phase.
16. Adopt and implement guidelines/measures to combat racism in law enforcement (including prohibiting racial profiling, adopting more severe sanctions against police violence, increasing racial diversity and trainings, etc.).

We ask for the Fundamental Rights Agency and OSCE-ODIHR to

17. Support civil society in collecting data and carrying out research specifically on the impact of Covid-19 on Muslim communities.

Executive Summary

The outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic shook the whole world in 2020. All countries have tried to control the spread of the pandemic. For this purpose, governments took measures such as exit and contact restrictions, mandatory masks, travel bans, etc. Despite the many measures, the numbers of “politically motivated crimes” did not decrease. In 2020, 901 Islamophobic crimes were committed across Germany, 146 of which targeted mosques and 48 of which targeted people. Of the 901 crimes, police were only able to arrest one person, while the attorney general did not open a single investigation into alleged Islamophobic and anti-Muslim crimes at the Federal Supreme Court. In the same year, at least 16 rallies of PEGIDA Förderverein in Dresden, a rally of Der III. Weg in Haiger, and a rally of Aufbruch Leverkusen in Leverkusen with the slogan “Against the Islamization of Germany” took place. In Germany, not only Muslims are exposed to physical and verbal attacks, but people of color in general are strongly affected by discrimination. From 1990 to 2020, 179 people died in police custody in Germany (12 in 2020). The majority of those who have died in custody were Blacks and Muslims. As the Fundamental Rights Reports published by the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) shows, racial profiling is a structural problem in the police. A study conducted by the Ruhr University of Bochum also confirms that a structural behavioural problem exists in the police against people of colour and people with an immigrant background. In addition to this problem, political hate speech and right-wing extremism against Muslims and refugees are becoming the “common language” in Germany. According to the Network Enforcement Act, supporters of the New Right and right-wing extremists conduct their hate speech and conspiracy theories against Muslims in alternative social networks, such as Gap, Telegram, or Voat. In Hanau, a right-wing extremist terrorist acting as a “lone wolf” shot and killed nine people with an immigrant background, his mother, and himself. The perpetrator specifically sought out venues frequented predominantly by people with an immigrant background. The terrorist had two weapons possession cards, although he was mentally ill and known to the police. People with an immigrant background who were well-known in the media, as well as many politicians, received threatening letters with the signature “NSU 2.0”. Their personal data was retrieved from computers in Wiesbaden’s 3rd and 4th police precincts, and Frankfurt’s 1st precinct. The annual increase in the number and types of attacks against Muslims finally caught the attention of the government. Thus, in November, a catalogue of measures, 89 in total, to combat right-wing extremism and racism was published by the Cabinet Committee. It is a good start in combating Islamophobia, but improvements still need to be made on many points, such as the reform of the General Equal Treatment Act, an expansion of the existing competence networks, the complete independence of the Federal Anti-Discrimination Agency, and in the federal states, the establishment of a reporting system to record anti-Muslim incidents.

Limitations to Islamic Practices

- Hijab Ban: There is a hijab ban for those who work in schools (schoolteachers), in the judiciary, and the police force. Until the ruling of the First Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court in 2015, the states of Baden-Württemberg, Bavaria, North Rhine-Westphalia, Berlin, Bremen, Hesse, Lower Saxony, and Saarland had a hijab ban for schoolteachers and academic staff. On January 27, 2015, the “First Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court ruled that a blanket ban on religious manifestations in public schools by the external appearance of educators is not compatible with their freedom of belief and confession (Article 4 [1] and [2] of the Basic Law).” (1 BvR 471/10, 1 BvR 1181/10). Despite this ruling, it is quite possible, especially in Berlin, that a headscarf-wearing teacher or teacher candidate will be discriminated against. According to a ruling of the European Court of Justice, private companies have the right to appear neutral to the outside world. This means that in certain cases, private companies can demand a “neutral appearance” from their employees. While prospective female prosecutors in Berlin are allowed to wear headscarves, judges and prosecutors in Lower Saxony cannot wear religious items or clothing, including headscarves, in the courtroom.

- Halal Slaughter Ban: Slaughter without stunning is generally prohibited in Germany. However, exemptions from this prohibition may be granted for religious reasons.

- Minaret Ban: No

- Circumcision Ban: No

- Burka Ban: Women civil servants, soldiers, and judges are not allowed to wear a burka – neither are women drivers. In some federal states, female pupils and students are not allowed to wear a burka in schools or universities.

- Prayer Ban: No
Introduction

According to reports by important European institutions such as the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) and the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA), the intolerance towards foreigners and Muslims is alarming in Germany. The intolerance and antipathy towards the Muslim community not only set a double standard in society and institutions but also create physical and verbal violence. Even the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 with all its societal restrictions could not bring about a decline in violent acts against Muslims and in the levels of Islamophobia. Racial profiling by police against people of colour or death traps in police custody are prominent signs of structural racism among security agencies. The state not only has a structural racism problem in its security agencies, but also in the school system, military, and other state institutions. The private sector mirrors this structural racism in fields such as the media and labour market.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

The first COVID-19 case in Germany was confirmed in Bavaria on January 27, 2020. On March 22, the federal and state governments agreed on exit and contact restrictions, forcing millions of people living in Germany to stay home. The restrictions were partially lifted by mid-summer. On October 15, the federal and state governments again had to determine further measures, which lasted until 2021.141 Despite the COVID-19 pandemic and numerous curfews, the numbers of physical and verbal attacks against Muslims did not decrease compared to previous years. As can be clearly seen in Table 1 below, the numbers of anti-Muslim crimes have remained almost the same. Since 2017, Islamophobic crimes have been registered separately by the Federal Ministry of the Interior (BMI). The subcategory “Islamophobic” was added to the category “politically motivated crime”. In 2017, 1,075 attacks were carried out against Muslims and their institutions. Over 100 attacks were on mosques and 56 on people. In 2018, the number of Islamophobic crimes with 910 registered cases, including 48 crimes against mosques, had somewhat decreased. In contrast, significantly more people (at least 74 people) were injured. In 2019, the number of Islamophobic crimes again increased to 950 with 90.1% of criminal offenses committed by right-wing extremists.142 The initiative brandeilig counted 141 mosque attacks for the year 2019 and 146 for the year 2020. In 2020, 901 Islamophobic crimes were committed across Germany, 146 of which targeted mosques and 48 of which targeted people. Of the 901 crimes, the police were able to arrest only one person, while the attorney general at the Federal Supreme Court did not open a single investigation into the alleged Islamophobic and anti-Muslim crimes. In the same year, at least 16 rallies of PE"GIDA Förderverein in Dresden, a rally of "Der III. Weg in Haiger, and a rally of "Aufbruch Leverkusen" in Leverkusen with the slogan “Against the Islamization of Germany” took place. The COVID-19 pandemic and curfew restrictions have not stopped right-wing extremists and criminals from attacking Muslim people and religious sites. Attacks on places of worship, mosque associations, or other Islamic institutions are not included in the statistics of the Federal Criminal Police Office. As the German Institute for Human Rights recommends in its statement on the planned measures of the Cabinet Committee for Combating Right-Wing Extremism and Racism, not only should the transparency of the constant evaluation of the planned measures be made possible, but the data on violent crimes against Muslims should be collected by the police even more transparently and comprehensively, and the possibility of including civil society in the data collection should be considered.

The European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) published its 6th report on Germany in March 2020. The commission is concerned with the “high level of Islamophobia” in Germany and it points to the increase of xenophobia in public discourse. In addition, the commission warns about the rise in the numbers of violent right-wing extremists. The report also mentions that the police do not cooperate with civil society to a sufficient extent in order to detect and register hate crimes. This leads to hate crimes in Germany virtually becoming an unpunished act. The deportation of asylum seekers who have been victims of hate crimes also makes it very difficult to combat hate crime. This is because the deportations usually take place before they can make their statements for the criminal proceedings. In a recently published global report by the Pew Research Center, Germany has the highest level of social hostility in the European Union. According to this report, among all social groups in Europe, Muslims face the highest levels of social hostility. A religion monitor published by the Bertelsmann Stiftung confirms the findings of the Pew report. According to the report, 54.5% of the German population see Islam as a threat, while religions such as Christianity, Judaism, Buddhism, and Hinduism are perceived as an enrichment of social culture.

The perception of the “Other” as a threat to society is not directed only to religious minorities, but extends to different ethnic groups. The murder of George Floyd by police in the U.S. on May 25, 2020 has again led to a discussion about racism in society and among the German police. From 1990 to 2020, 179 people died in police custody in Germany, 12 of whom in 2020. The majority of the deceased are Blacks and Muslims. As the Fundamental Rights Reports published by the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) shows racial profiling in the police is a structural problem. Although the Federal Minister of the Interior Horst Seehofer denied that there is a structural racism problem in the police,\(^{152}\) scientific studies show different results. According to a study conducted by Ruhr-University Bochum, there is a structural behavioural problem in the police against people of colour and people with an immigrant background. According to the study, the discriminatory incidents experienced are not individual problems of individual police officers, but a structural problem of police practice. In other words, it is an engrained part of the way the police behave when carrying out their duties.\(^{153}\)

One police officer who participated in the study explained how some officers engage in racist behaviour: “Today we’re going to hunt Turks. Then they would go on targeted searches during patrols. Little things - for example, if someone forgot to signal - would then be blown out of proportion.”\(^{154}\)

Amnesty International also issued a statement on structural racism in the police stating, “Addressing institutional racism is overdue. All security forces must receive appropriate mandatory anti-racism training to also end unintentional discrimination against people of colour and marginalised groups. Allegations of unlawful police violence must be independently and swiftly investigated.”\(^{155}\)

Adding to this problem, political hate speech and right-wing extremism against Muslims and refugees are becoming the “common language” in Germany.\(^{156}\) Thus, serious tensions arise in society, which occasionally lead to a confrontation between minorities and the police. An example of this is the Stuttgart riots on the night of June 20-21, 2020. During a police check in the park Schlossgarten, the situation escalated between the security forces and the revellers. Of the 400-500 people who took part in the riot, 25 were arrested. Among them were 12 German citizens (including three individuals with an immigrant background) while the remaining were foreigners.\(^{157}\) Following the arrests, the individuals with an immigrant background and the refugees became the targets of some politicians. Right away, Baden-Württemberg’s Interior Minister Thomas Strobl (CDU) commented on the topic with the following words: “Multiculturalism has its clear limits in the applicable laws, especially the criminal laws. And there is no discount whatsoever in Stuttgart and Baden-Würt-

The parliamentary director of the CSU in the Bundestag Stefan Müller made direct associations between the migrants and alcohol and drugs. Thus, discussions were held on respect for the police, the integration problems of migrants, and the failure of multiculturalism.

The failure of the police and politicians to pursue hate crime consistently, which has become structural racism, and the Islamophobic discourse of politicians, which becomes daily political rhetoric, not only led to the riots in Stuttgart, but on occasion prepared the ground for right-wing, extremist terrorist attacks like the one in Hanau.

In Hanau, a right-wing terrorist acting allegedly as a “lone wolf” shot nine people with an immigrant background, his mother, and himself. The perpetrator specifically sought out venues frequented predominantly by people with an immigrant background. The terrorist had two weapons possession cards, although he was mentally ill and known to the police. As with the attacks in Oslo, Christchurch, and Halle, the Hanau attack received widespread media attention is terms of whether the attacker was sane or not. When terrorist attacks are committed by far-right groups or individuals, the question that remains in the background and is never addressed is how the system radicalizes people so that they carry out terrorist attacks against Muslims or immigrants.

Structural racism is not only a police phenomenon in Germany – it also takes place on a daily basis in other state institutions. In schools, children with an immigrant background do not receive the support they need and are disadvantaged when it comes to grades. In the field of science, the situation is no different. Non-European scientists have difficulties publishing their articles in prestigious journals, and their work does not find its way into curricula and textbooks. Immigrants are also worse off than other citizens when it comes to the healthcare system. They are usually poorly informed about the healthcare system and their rights. Most patients feel that they are not taken seriously by medical staff.163

Reported Attacks: A Selection

February 2020: A right-wing extremist terrorist shot nine people with an immigrant background, his mother, and himself in Hanau. The perpetrator specifically sought out venues frequented predominantly by people with an immigrant background.

A right-wing terrorist cell planned a terrorist attack on a mosque modelled on the Christchurch attack. After raids, 12 right-wing extremists were arrested in six states. Lawyer Seda Başay-Yıldız, who had represented NSU victims as a joint plaintiff, received repeated threatening letters from “NSU 2.0.” She received four letters with death threats against herself, her family, and her young daughter.

March 2020: The third-largest mosque in Germany, Fatih Mosque, received an envelope with a powdery substance and a threatening letter. The hate letter contained racist and Islamophobic threats, said a spokesman for the Islamic Federation Bremen.165

April 2020: During the COVID-19 pandemic, the PEGIDA leadership and sympathisers could only organize limited public events. In order not to lose sympathisers, Lutz Bachmann organised several “virtuelle Abendspaziergänge” (virtual evening walks) on his YouTube channel. His guests were from the circles of right-wing extremist and Islamicophobic groups. On April 13, his “Zweiter virtuelle Abendspaziergänge” (second virtual evening walk) featured Martin Sellner, the leading activist of the far-right Identitarian Movement (IB) in German-speaking countries, and Michael Stürzenberger, the central figure of the Islamophobic scene in Bavaria, which is relevant to constitutional protection. In the conversation it often came up that migrants/Muslims do not adhere to the legal pandemic regulations, that Muslims only respect “eigenes Gesetz” (their own law) and that they are the “Vorboten des großen Jihad” (harbingers of the great Jihad). Muslims were repeatedly labelled with disparaging language such as “Gruppe der Rechtgläubigen” (group of orthodox) or “bei diesem Klientel” (with this clientele), and stigmatised because of their beliefs as a danger to internal security and to the health of individual citizen.166

May 2020: A group of youths attacked several asylum seekers in Brandenburg. The group, which consisted of about 15-20 people, encircled and insulted immigrants sitting in the park and then went after them. The attackers beat immigrants coming from Guinea and Morocco, and called them racist names.167

June 2020: A gym in Dudweiler refused to allow a woman to work out because of her headscarf. Such house bans in fitness studios have been observed in Germany for years. The owners interpret that wearing a headscarf during training is dangerous, so they plead in favour of health precautions for their members and their actions are not considered an act of discrimination.168 Yet, in almost every sport there are female athletes wearing headscarves who have not yet suffered any health damage as a result.

According to the Military Counterintelligence Service (MAD), there are more than 600 suspected cases of right-wing extremists in the Bundeswehr, the armed forces of Germany. The counterintelligence service singled out the elite special forces military command unit Kommando Spezialkräfte (KSK) with 20 suspects.169

Another case of a right-wing extremist causing bodily harm to people of a different faith occurred in Leipzig when a 25-year-old Syrian was mobbed and beaten up by four perpetrators.170

A young Muslim woman in Nuremberg was insulted and attacked in an Islamophobic manner by an unknown person.171

In Germany, more and more people of Islamic faith are being attacked on the streets by right-wing extremists for no reason. For the seventh time, the Damascus bakery in Berlin-Neukölln was the victim of a right-wing attack. For years there have been attacks of the right-wing extremists on migrants and leftists. They smear Nazi symbols on the walls, smash shop windows, and set cars on fire. According to the police, there were 72 acts, 23 of which are arsons. Only in 2017, two charges were brought against suspects for Nazi graffiti, without conviction. All 72 acts remained unpunished.\(^{172}\)

July 2020: Cabaret artist Idil Baydar received threatening letters with the signature “NSU 2.0”. Her personal data was retrieved from a computer in the 4th precinct of the Wiesbaden police headquarters, as was the personal data of lawyer Seda Başay-Yıldız (1st precinct in Frankfurt) and Hessian Left Party leader Janine Wissler (3rd precinct in Wiesbaden). Although the police had been aware of the query of Idil Baydar’s data since March 2019, Baydar was not informed.\(^{173}\) Left-wing politician Gökdeniz Özçetin and Mannheim member of the Bundestag Gökay Akbultut received emails with death threats which also carried the signature “NSU 2.0”.\(^{174}\) Within a month, severed pig heads were found twice at an Islamic cultural centre in Greifswald. In both cases, there is no evidence leading to the suspects.\(^{175}\)

August 2020: In Erfurt, three men from Guinea were attacked by a right-wing extremist group. One of the three men was seriously injured and in critical condition. Police reported a “xenophobic attack”.\(^{176}\) In southern Hesse, Fürth and Wahlen, threatening letters with racist content were sent to two DITIB mosques and private individuals. The case was investigated in connection with the NSU 2.0 threats. The mosques were threatened with arson and sprayed with “NSE 2020”.\(^{177}\) Such threatening letters are also received by journalists, lawyers, and many other political figures.\(^{178}\) In addition, a chat group among police officers in which right-wing extremist content was exchanged was discovered during the investigation. In recent years, there have been 13 right-wing extremist cases in the North Rhine-Westphalia (NRW) and nearly 200 similar cases in police ranks throughout Germany.\textsuperscript{179} A similar chat group was found to have been set up at the professional fire department in Bremen.\textsuperscript{180}

September 2020: In Heidenau, Saxony, a young Muslim woman was insulted and attacked by three men on the street. The attackers tore off her headscarf.\textsuperscript{181} In Neubrandenburg, a pig head was placed on the terrace of a Syrian tenant by unknown persons.\textsuperscript{182} In a police operation near Hamburg, 250 firearms and several thousand rounds of ammunition were seized from a man with right-wing views.\textsuperscript{183} The realisation of the existence of such arms depots in Germany or in Europe and of submerged right-wing extremists with terrorist potential arouse great concern among minorities.

October 2020: In Berlin, a disproportionate raid by Berlin police took place at the Mevlana Mosque in Kreuzberg. As a result of a suspected Corona emergency aid fraud amounting to €70,000, the police conducted a large-scale search with 150 officers.\textsuperscript{184} Such a disproportionate use of security forces at a religious site is incomprehensible. Since the mosque’s congregation poses no threat to officials or the public, and the raid is not about suspected “terrorism” but about a suspected financial fraud, such provocative actions by the police only confirm the suspected structural racism in their ranks.

November 2020: The same police approach with the large-scale raid at the Mevlana Mosque in Kreuzberg was witnessed in the deployment of the Berlin police at Furkan e.V. in Neukölln, this time with 90 police officers. The association is said to have applied for unauthorized aid in April.\textsuperscript{185} The provocative and disproportionate police operations against Islamic associations and mosques only serve to criminalize Muslims in public.186

December 2020: Security authorities were searching for 475 right-wing extremists, among whom about 70 potential terrorists, who had gone into hiding.187 After a search of a huge arsenal of weapons in Austria, several suspects were arrested in Bavaria, NRW, and Austria. Austrian Interior Minister Karl Nehammer suspected that the arsenal might have been used to build up a right-wing militia.188 The imam of the Islamic Cultural Centre, who lives in Wolfsburg, found an unstamped envelope in his private mailbox. Inside the envelope was a picture of a coffin and on it were the words “You will be here soon. Dirty.”189 Muslims living in Germany receive such death threats daily. Another case was reported from Offenbach. A man on a bus called a Muslim woman wearing a headscarf Islamophobic names and threatened other passengers with a knife.190 Yavuz Sultan Selim Mosque in Offenbach was smeared with political slogans191 and near Ömer Mosque in Sulz am Neckar a note was hung on a streetlight. On the note were right-wing extremist slogans such as “Germany belongs to the Germans” or “Foreigners out”.192 The outer façade of a kindergarten in Wolfenbüttel was smeared with right-wing extremist, anti-Semitic and Islamophobic slogans and symbols.193 In Hamburg, a 51-year-old woman tried to tear off the headscarf of a young Muslim woman. In the process, the attacker hit, kicked, and scolded her.194

There are many examples of attacks on mosques and Muslims. Although some action is being taken against Islamophobia, whether by the state or civil society, it's still not enough to bring the structural and social Islamophobia under control. As many Muslims have reported, women with headscarves are afraid of being insulted, beaten, or attacked on the street or in the subway in Germany. A police operation in Wuppertal against a 22-year-old Muslim woman wearing a headscarf makes it clear why Muslim women are increasingly afraid of security forces or of simply being in public. An eyewitness described the case as follows: "the young mother had left the dentist’s office with a stroller and had forgotten to put her mask back on. Immediately, three police officers allegedly restrained her and also handcuffed her. Her arms were twisted so that the woman screamed in pain." Nine police officers participated in the operation against the woman with the stroller.

Employment

People are discriminated against for various reasons in society. People are discriminated against because of their age, gender, physical appearance, ethnic origin, disability, or religion. The same happens in the labour market or when looking for a job. A study conducted by the Social Science Research Center Berlin shows that applicants with an immigrant background have less success in finding a job than “German” applicants. According to the study, 60% of applicants with German names receive positive feedback. For applicants with an immigrant background, this was only 51%. Not only ethnic origin plays an important role in integration in the labour market, but the religious affiliation of applicants is also significant. While 57% of Christians and 53% of Buddhists and Hindus could look forward to a positive response, only 46% of Muslims received a positive message from the employer. There is also a difference in the positive feedback rate when an applicant with an immigrant background signals closeness to Christianity in their application as opposed to an applicant who signals closeness to Islam (about 9%). This shows that it is not the “non-Christians” but the Muslims in specific who face discrimination. The study covers occupations such as hotel manager, cook, industrial clerk, salesperson, plant mechanic, mechatronics technician, and medical and dental assistant. The study shows that discrimination is greater in highly skilled professions such as engineering, medicine, architecture, science, etc. For example, in the beginning of 2020, it became known that a man was discriminated against because of his origin. He applied for an internship at an architectural office in Berlin and as a response he received an internal company email, which was mistakenly sent to him, saying “no Arabs please”.198 Most of the time it is very difficult to prove discrimination because it is often expressed verbally; however, in this case, there was written proof.

Similar results were presented in another study. According to this study, 53% of the majority candidates receive a positive response, while 49% percent of candidates of Turkish origin can look forward to a positive response from an employer.200 This leads to the idea that, in the eyes of employers, Muslims and immigrants with Turkish origin are quickly rejected. A report on Germany shows that 50.57% of the ma-

Majority candidates received a positive response from an employer, where only 44.34% percent of the standard Muslim and 40.59% of the overtly Muslim candidates received a call-back when applying for a job.201

According to a study by the Institute for Employment Research, Germans’ trust in people from other countries varies greatly by country. The less the trust in the country a migrant comes from, the more the migrant suffers from discrimination in the labour market. Germans trust Poles the least (21%), which seems to stem more from historical reasons. Trust in people from Turkey is 34% with trust in Italians at 55% and Austrians at 78%. Trust also varies greatly by state. Trust in Turks is 27% in Hesse, but in Berlin it is 42%. There is a strong correlation between trust and duration of unemployment. If the confidence of Germans in a country triples, the average duration of unemployment for this group could be cut in half.202

Some examples of discrimination from the business world follow: a man looking for an apprenticeship applied to a Brandenburg company. He was immediately rejected by e-mail. The managing director wrote in his letter, “Among the seven applications, there are other, more suitable candidates. Furthermore, working in our company as a practicing Muslim is undesirable. In my eyes, Islam cannot be reconciled with the constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (BRD). [...] Nevertheless, I wish you all the best for the future and hope that you will find your way back to your homeland and can live there according to your principles, just as we Germans want to live in our homeland of Germany according to our liberal principles.”203 The letter showcases how everyday racism is considered a normal code of conduct or even a manifestation of patriotism. Most likely, the managing director did not understand that his Islamophobic and xenophobic behaviour was violating the very constitution he so highly praises in his letter – he probably believes that the constitution applies only to biological Germans and not to “pass Germans or foreigners”.

A single mother with one child applied for an apprenticeship as an office management assistant at a tax consulting company. Since she had a picture with a headscarf on her application, the managing director wrote to her that the application was an “alibi letter for ALG II (Unemployment Benefit II)” and that “as a tip for the future, the applicant should also do without her ‘headdress’ in a serious application”.204

A 16-year-old girl from Hamburg applied for a job as a summer temporary employee at the Edeka supermarket. On the very first day of the trial, the store manager came and allegedly said, “Take off your headscarf or you can’t work here.” Following the incident, she quit her job.206

The European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) report on Germany emphasizes that parents or students from sub-Saharan Africa (18%) and from Turkey (15%) feel discriminated against in German educational institutions. Not only students with an immigrant background have a hard time at school, 16% of all 15-year-old Germans experience bullying a few times a month. It is not difficult to imagine what students from other backgrounds must have to experience. In addition, teacher training is insufficient when it comes to teaching in a diverse environment. Human rights, teaching in diverse classes, and dealing with discrimination and bullying are not mandatory components of teacher licensure, teacher training, or in-service training. Textbooks and teaching materials continue to contain stereotypes and derogatory portrayals with regard to origin, religion, or gender. The diversity of the German nation is not sufficiently conveyed in textbooks as teaching material.207

An example of the stereotyping of refugees in a Berlin textbook is the following: “For refugees from poor countries, the right of asylum offers the opportunity to live with us and participate, albeit modestly, in German prosperity.” Textbook publishers could also play a role in improving the representation of diversity in textbooks. However, the experts needed for this are either underpaid by publishers or not paid at all.208

Figures 4 and 5: Excerpt from the theme booklet Natural Science Biology, Chemistry, Physics - Colours, which was used in a Saxon school until 2018. As an assignment, students were asked to match the different eyes, noses, and hair types to specific “racial circles.”209

Although some publishers try to remove clichés, stereotypes, and generalisations from their instructional material, this is a more deeply rooted problem than changing a few words or pictures. In addition to school material, the traditional rules, habits, routines, and organisational structures of a school affect racism in education.210 For example, in a 3rd grade textbook, people in Africa are generally portrayed as being so poor that they don’t have real houses but straw huts, and their children can’t go to school. “The students are then asked about this, [and] why they have it better.”211 Until the end of 2018, the thematic booklet Natural Sciences: Biology, Chemistry, Physics - Colors, which was published in 1998 by the former GDR publishing house Volk und Wissen, was used in school lessons in Dresden. The people pictured below are assigned to the “Negrid”, the “Europid”, and the “Mongolid racial circle”. “The students are asked to assign different eyes, noses, and hair types to certain “racial circles”. The structural analysis of history and politics textbooks in Germany shows a simplistic portrayal of Islam while Muslims are shown as a non-European “Other”. According to this, Islam and a “modern Europe” exist as homogeneous entities that are mutually exclusive. The evaluation of “Islam” as an antiquated and premodern “Other” that does not fit into Europe can have a promoting effect on cultural racism. Most of the topics that are related to Islam are related to decolonisation, the Middle East conflict, international terrorism, Islamism, the “new world order”, and the “clash of civilizations”. In social studies, Islam is treated alongside such topics as migration, the headscarf, and the mosque dispute. Also, from the cultural point of view, “Islamic” and “Arab” are treated as identical stereotypes. Inner-Islamic diversity is overlooked. Again and again, the books build up a link back to the foundation of Islam and its expansion in the Middle Ages and the importance of the Koran for Muslims. Muslims are generally associated with pictures from Mecca or as camel riders in the desert. While the depiction of Islam in the Middle Ages is linked to jihad and expansion interpretations, “conflict” is considered the central concept with references to war, terrorism, and fundamentalism in the context of international politics and migration in the modern depiction of Muslims.

Racism in German textbooks appears not only in topics such as Islam, Muslims, or Turks, but everything “different” from Western European gets its share. For example, people from Africa are represented in two ways: by Afro-pessimism and Afro-romanticism. According to Afro-pessimism, the continent of Africa is a place of misery and incapacity, and according to Afro-romanticism it is an exotic, natural, and untouched land. Both representations are based on the ideology of racial hierarchy.

Politics

The strongest far-right and Islamophobic party in 2020 remained the Alternative for Germany (AfD). According to the foundation Bertelmann Stiftung’s Populism Barometer 2020, just under 8% of voters in Germany are manifestly right-wing extremists and 24% are latently right-wing extremists. In all parties there are more or less right-wing extremist voters: in the CDU 6% are manifestly right-wing extremists and 18% are latent right-wing extremists; in the Greens’ electorate the proportion of manifestly right-wing extremists is 2% and 8% are latent extremists. But the concentration of right-wing extremists in the AfD electorate is remarkable. Among them, 29% are manifest right-wing extremists and 56% latent right-wing extremists. Their attitudes toward far-right ideology should also be noted. Fifteen per cent of AfD voters are in favour of a right-wing dictatorship, 13% in favour of trivialising National Socialism, 13% are anti-Semitic, 54% are chauvinists, and 65% are xenophobes. What was not asked in the barometer is the respondents’ opinion about Islam and Muslims. But one gets a strong indication of this from the link between AfD supporters and xenophobia. Accordingly, it can be assumed that two-thirds of AfD supporters are Islamophobic. As right-wing extremism researcher Matthias Quent explains, the AfD’s electoral success in eastern Germany has most likely contributed to its radicalisation. The AfD electorate is also aware of the party’s right-wing radicalism. Right-wing extremist Björn Höcke-led völkisch-nationalist AfD group Der Flügel was classified by the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution as a “secured right-wing extremist effort against the free democratic ground order.” As a result, Der Flügel “dissolved” itself at the end of March 2020. Despite the alleged dissolution, according to the president of the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution Thomas Haldenwang, supporters of the group continue to hold key positions in internal party elections. The AfD and its even more extremist subgroups are a danger not only to Muslims, Jews, or Germans who think differently, but also to democracy and human rights in Germany and Europe as a whole. A good example is the government crisis in Thuringia in February 2020. The plot of the AfD, and specifically Höcke, to elect FDP candidate Thomas Kemmerich as prime minister with the votes of the FDP and the CDU shook the entire German democracy. This AfD “strategy” cost the posts of Annegret Kramp-Karrenbauer as CDU federal chairwoman, Mike Mohring as CDU state chairman and parliamentary group chairman in Thuringia and Ostbeauftragte (Eastern Commissioner) of the federal government, and of Christian Hirte as parliamentary state secretary. What is even more alarming are the comments welcoming the support of the AfD by top FDP politicians such as FDP leader Christian Lindner who stated, “Who [...] supports our candidates in a secret ballot, that is not in our power”219 or FDP Vice Chairman Wolfgang Kubicki who claimed, “It is a great success for Thomas Kemmerich. A candidate of the democratic centre has won. [...] What the constitution provides for should not be discredited.”220

The AfD adopted its Program for Germany at the federal party congress in Stuttgart on April 30/May 1, 2016. In its party program with the subtitle “7.6 Islam in Tension”, the AfD places Islam in a discriminatory manner alongside the Judeo-Christian and humanistic foundations of German culture. Immediately afterwards, it becomes clear what is actually meant by this, namely “7.6.1 Islam Does Not Belong to Germany”, which cannot actually be true since many Muslims have been born in Germany or have built their lives in Germany. By denying this, the more than 4 million Muslims living in Germany will not simply disappear. The denial of entire religious groups or “alien species” is a typical symptom of right-wing extremists. In this manner, the AfD proposes a “democratic” defamation of Islam with its “religion criticism” agenda which exclusively targets Islam. The AfD wants to disguise its Islamophobic and racist attitude towards Islam and Muslims as a whole. Where Christians can allow their faith to be freely shaped by churches and Jews by their synagogues, the AfD would like to impose their own worldview on Islam and Muslims, and prevent the practice of religion by laws. However, this is incompatible with the German Constitution (“No one may be disadvantaged or favoured because of his faith or religious beliefs, Article 3 Paragraph 3) and freedom of religion (Article 4 GG). The AfD’s campaign “Together for the Constitution” also serves to instrumentalize Islam for political purposes; whether the campaign supports the constitution or questions its legitimacy is highly questionable. Thus, the public controversially talks about Islam no longer as a faith but as an ideology, and mostly as a security risk for German culture or even for the state, which is to be restructured according to the “will of the majority” or the federal government. Some examples of the deconstruction of the Islamic faith are terms like political Islam, Islamism, legalistic Islamism, Euro Islam, German Islam, Islamkritik, Muslimekritik, and enlightened Islam. Actually, such “Islam-critical” discourses, so much adorned with charm and alleged “freedom of speech” statements, are only modern exclusion strategies of the right-wing extremists who want to exclude Muslims from society, as happened in the recent past with Jews in Germany.

CDU city councillor Wolfgang Jacobi from Radebeul participated in the Islamophobic and racist 200th PEGIDA march in Dresden. The rapprochement of some CDU politicians with the Islamophobic AfD and PEGIDA is worrying for Muslims living in Germany.

In the Bavarian state of Swabia, a German entrepreneur, Şener Şahin, wanted to be the CSU’s candidate for mayor. Although he was born near Wallerstein in Swabia, he had to withdraw his candidacy after fierce protests from the local CSU association because of his Muslim faith. Şahin has only German citizenship, has a Protestant wife, was born in Germany, and is a successful entrepreneur. However, he was not considered a good candidate by the CSU local association because of his foreign roots and being a Muslim. Although one in four citizens in Germany has an immigrant background, they are underrepresented in politics. Only 8% of members of the Bundestag and 4% of members of the Landtag have an immigrant background.

A recent study by the Council of Experts on Integration and Migration shows that migrant associations are important actors in civil society in Germany and make an important political contribution, particularly in integration work. A proportional representation of people with an immigrant background in German politics would undoubtedly ease many areas of tension in daily politics.

Media

Since the 1970s, Muslim immigrants have been portrayed in the media as unemployed, welfare recipients, and criminals. Especially since the New Year’s Eve of 2015 in Cologne, they have been also represented by right-wing extremists as rapists - this opinion has been even more reinforced after the riots in Stuttgart. With their “reporting” on the right-wing scene, the media are becoming the mouthpieces of right-wing extremists across Germany.

If you look at the official figures of the Federal Criminal Police Office on crime, the reports and the facts do not match. As shown in Tables 2 and 3, the total number of crimes and of crimes committed by immigrants have been decreasing since 2015, contrary to what is claimed in the media and by populist and extreme politicians.

The misdirected reporting or defamation of Muslims in the media is not just a matter of bias on the part of those employed in the sector. It indicates the existence of a structurally ordered elitist ecosystem that is adopted by almost every employee in the media industry. Peter Frey, editor-in-chief from ZDF (Second German Television), explains this situation as follows, “But the question is how much in quotes minority status actually remains when someone works in such an established medium and in such an exposed situation. So even the one or two who come rather from the fringes of society grow. And that is also positive. On the one hand, thank God, then into the middle, so to speak, and represents the middle. And at the same time, it loses a bit of the status and the role and the function of representing a minority. But I also observe this phenomenon not only among people with a Muslim, Turkish, Arab background. I also observe it among East Germans.”

The study by the German Center for Integration and Migration Research (DeZIM) shows how few people with an immigrant background and East Germans are represented in the German elite. Only in the area of religion people with an immigrant background are represented proportionately to their demographic share; however, in areas such as security (0%), justice (1.3%), military (2.0%), administration (4.6%), unions (3.0%), politics (7.7%) and media (16.4%) they have almost no or little participation.

Bild Live, a television channel, reported immediately after the Hanau attack and speculated that the deeds took place in a “criminal milieu”. The operator of the shisha bar was immediately portrayed as a criminal who was involved in the shooting for protection money or supremacy. Even the places of the events were described as “not bourgeois enough”.

Justice System

A right to pastoral care is particularly important for people who are in prison. According to the Ministry of Justice and the Migration Commissioner of Thuringia, there are problems with pastoral care for Muslim inmates in prisons. Muslim inmates do not receive the same pastoral care as Christian inmates because there is a lack of chaplains. Muslim chaplains have no degree that can be compared to Christian chaplains, which makes hiring difficult. For 100 prisoners of Roman Catholic faith and 80 of Protestant faith, there are seven Protestant chaplains and three Roman Catholic chaplains.

in Thuringia. But for 160 imprisoned Muslims, there is not a single state-approved Muslim chaplain. A lack of Muslim chaplains is a problem not only in Thuringia but throughout Germany. For example, for around 1,000 prisoners of Muslim faith in Lower Saxony, there are only 23 Muslim chaplains.

A perennial Islamophobic controversy in Germany is whether or not wearing headscarves is allowed in courtrooms. While prospective female prosecutors in Berlin are allowed to wear headscarves, judges and prosecutors in Lower Saxony cannot wear religious items or clothing, including headscarves, in the courtroom. In the same year (2020), a woman wearing a headscarf was appointed as a district judge for the first time in Great Britain, while in Munich, a female honorary judge was suspended and impeachment proceedings were initiated against her because she wore a headscarf during oral proceedings.

The Federal Prosecutor General at the Federal Supreme Court has undertaken only one preliminary investigation from the 901 Islamophobic crimes reported in Germany, of which 146 were against mosques and 48 against people. The preliminary investigation involved the preparation for an arson attack on Muslim people. The other 900 crimes went unpunished.

Internet

Since 1992, the judiciary has tracked data on xenophobic and far-right crimes, and since 2019, it has collected data on hate crime nationwide. In 2017, 7,913 cases were attributed to hate crime, of which 2,270 hate comments were spread on the internet. Unfortunately, there is no knowledge of what the judiciary does with this data. Will the data be forwarded to the police by the judiciary so that they can be investigated and sentenced or will there be no investigation opened against them by the Attorney General at the Federal Supreme Court, similarly to the Islamophobic crimes? In 2017, the Network Enforcement Act (NetzDG) came into force in Germany. This makes it possible to learn the numbers of hate speech deleted by social network companies. According to its transparency report, in 2020, 194,440 comments - specifically 176,774 in 2019 and 159,676 in 2018 - containing hate speech or political extremism were reported to Google. Of these, 50,498 were removed from the network in 2020, 48,259 in 2019, and 44,739 in 2018.\(^{237}\) On Facebook, there were 10,439 complaints in 2020, which led to the deletion of 3,584 pieces of content.\(^{238}\) Unlike the other social networks, Twitter received 1,577,184 complaints in 2020 and took action against 241,099 of these complaints. Before that, it received 1,346,991 complaints and took action in 183,873 cases.\(^{239}\) Facebook and Twitter are still the most used platforms for hate comments. After all, the Christchurch right-wing terrorist live-streamed his act on Facebook. Although companies do a lot to prevent hate crime, only just under one-third of complaints resulted in action; on Twitter, this number was almost one-tenth. It is a known fact that only the comments that are considered as hate speech by companies are actually deleted or receive an administrative warning. It is also uncertain whether any prosecution will arise from these comments.

After the Network Enforcement Act came into force in 2017, hate comments were continuously deleted on a large scale by the established social network companies. The deletion of the content causes the right-wing extremists to change platforms. They now use VK, the Russian equivalent of Facebook, Gab (and before that Parler) instead of Twitter, or Voat instead of Reddit. As is explained in an analysis of the Amadeu Antonio Foundation, despite the high numbers in major platforms, right-wing extremists use smaller alternative platforms for recruitment. The right-wing terrorist groups operate anonymously, react quickly to deletions of their platforms, and despite the anonymity, they succeed in attracting new members. These groups usually operate globally and the members, called “anons”, often do not know each other. Through subcultural codes, language, and symbols they find their way to each other. For closer networking, they use messenger services like WhatsApp, Wire, Element, Signal, and especially Telegram with its closed groups. Other communication channels are the imageboards or forums where people can anonymously publish topics or posts. Providing a passage to the darknet, they offer bomb- or weapon-making guides or announce their terror plans, as was done by the right-wing terrorists of Christchurch, Poway, El Paso, and Bærum. One of the most famous imageboards is 4Chan with its subforum “Political Incorrect” alongside 8kun, Endchan, Krautchan, Anon Cafe, Volksfront, and Stromfront. Besides YouTube and Vimeo, other popular video platforms are Bitchute, Bitube, DLive, Rumble, and DonnerSender. Gaming platforms, such as Discord, Steam, and Twitch, are also often used for right-wing extremist propaganda. On the Discord platform, the far-right demonstration in Charlottesville “Unite the Right” Rally 2017 was organized. At the demonstration, a right-wing terrorist drove his car into counter-demonstrators and killed Heather Heyer.²⁴⁰

According to its report, the Digital Analysis Unit at the Institute for Strategic Dialogue (ISD) identified 379 far-right and right-wing populist channels on ten alternative platforms: 129 on Telegram, 115 on VK, 79 on Bitchute, 38 on Gab, 8 on Reddit, 5 on Minds, and 5 on Voat. About 15,000 to 50,000 German speakers with far-right views use these platforms. According to the report, most channels are close to Islamophobic users and neo-Nazis. Identitarian groups have the largest reach. Of the 379 groups and channels identified by the ISD, 104 channels focused on rejection of Islam and Muslims, immigration, and refugees. Among them, the most popular Islamophobic channel has 18,000 followers. Islamophobic content by right-wing extremists is published more frequently on Gab than on other platforms. Posts about Islam and Muslims often use Islamophobic clichés, such as that Islam is a threat to European culture. Discrimination against Muslims is justified and Islam is portrayed as a monolithic, alien, and inferior religion.²⁴¹

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

Once again, it can be claimed that the AfD spokesman and parliamentary group leader of the AfD in the Thuringian state parliament Björn Höcke is one of the most important figures of the Islamophobic network in 2020. In the past years, Höcke has made a name for himself with statements such as “#Islam has a homeland and it’s not called #Europe!”, “There must be an end to ‘Mohamed, Muezzin & Minaret’ at the Bosporus!” and “Islam has its homeland, but this homeland is not called Erfurt, it is not called Thuringia. This homeland is not called Germany.” His relations with the Islamophobic PEGIDA also caused quite a stir. On February 17, 2020, at the 200th rally of PEGIDA, Höcke was at the forefront.²⁴² He also planned a remigration project in his book Nie zweimal in denselben Fluss (Never twice in the same river), 2018, where human hardships had to be shown²⁴³.

In 2020, Höcke again showed his xenophobic and Islamophobic side with a tweet directed against Carola Rackete, the German ship captain who works for the sea rescue organisation Sea-Watch. The public prosecutor’s office in Mühlhausen saw in the tweet a suspicion of incitement and stigmatization of certain groups of people - in this case refugees - as criminals. As a result, the prosecutor’s office requested the lifting of Höcke’s immunity, which was granted by the judicial committee of the state parliament in Erfurt.

In March 2020, the Office for the Protection of the Constitution classified Höcke and Brandenburg parliamentary group leader Andreas Kalbitz, as “right-wing extremists”.\(^{248}\) The Saxon AfD member of the Bundestag Jens Maier has also been classified as a right-wing extremist by the Office for the Protection of the Constitution.\(^{249}\) Brandenburg’s new AfD parliamentary party leader Hans-Christoph Berndt is a “proven right-wing extremist” according to Jörg Müller, the head of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution. Berndt is the head of the right-wing association _Zukunft Heimat_ and for years was also a central figure in organizing demonstrations against the influx of foreigners in Cottbus.\(^{250}\)

Another important figure of the Islamophobic network is the founder of the PEGIDA movement Lutz Bachmann. During the COVID-19 pandemic restrictions when no public events could take place, he organised “virtuelle Abendspaziergänge" (virtual evening walk) on his YouTube channel. The second “virtual evening walk” was attended by Martin Sellner, the leading activist of the right-wing extremist Identitarian Movement (IB) and Michael Stürzenberger, the central figure of the Islamophobic scene in Bavaria, which is relevant for the protection of the constitution. Michael Stürzenberger is an author for the far-right and Islamophobic blog “Politically Incorrect” and is monitored by the Bavarian State Office for the Protection of the Constitution. Stürzenberger compares the Koran with _Mein Kampf_.\(^{251}\) For him and many other supporters of the New Right, Islam is not a religion but an ideology.\(^{252}\) In a live video, the containment measures for the COVID-19 pandemic were discussed. Again and again, there was talk about how migrants or Muslims oppose the pandemic rules, while the “Germans” follow them. It was said that the migrants only obey their “own law” and they are as “harbingers of the great jihad” in Germany.\(^{253}\)

In November 2020, the Cabinet Committee published its catalogue of measures to combat right-wing extremism and racism. The catalogue, consisting of 89 measures, was welcomed by CLAIM, a broad social alliance against the exclusion of Muslims, intolerance, discrimination, Islamophobia and Muslimophobia, and other civil organizations. Regarding some points, CLAIM demanded improvements such as the reform of the General Equal Treatment Act; a “further development” of existing competence centres and networks; the expansion of phenomenon-specific, community-based monitoring; and the introduction of a nationwide reporting system to record anti-Muslim incidents.254

In January 2020, the Competence Network Islam and Muslimophobia was founded. The network includes CLAIM and is supported by Teilseitend e.V., Arbeitsgemeinschaft der Evangelischen Jugend in Deutschland e.V. (aeg), and the Center for European and Oriental Culture e.V. (ZEOK). According to its own statement, the network’s goal is “to bundle and further develop expertise on the topic of Islam and Muslim hostility and anti-Muslim racism and to make it available to education, politics, administration and civil society in the coming years”.255

The Ministry of the Interior has appointed a 12-member256 independent expert committee from academia and from the field under the name Unabhängiger Expertenkreis Muslimfeindlichkeit (Independent expert group on anti-Muslim hostility) (UEM). The group will “analyse current and changing manifestations of Muslim hostility and examine them for intersections with anti-Semitic attitudes as well as other forms of group-based hostility”.257

256. The experts are Iman Attia, Alice Salomon University of Applied Sciences Berlin; Karim Fereidooni, Ruhr University Bochum; Kai Hafez, University of Erfurt; Anja Middelbeck-Varwick, Johann Wolfgang Goethe University Frankfurt; Mathias Rohe, Friedrich Alexander University Erlangen Nuremberg; Christine Schirrmacher, Friedrich Wilhelm University Bonn and Catholic University Leuven; Yasemin Shooman, German Center for Integration and Migration Research (DeZIM); Karima Benbrahim, Information and Documentation Center for Anti-Racism Work (IDA); Sahra-Nur Cheema, Anne Frank Educational Center; Yasemin El-Menouar, Bertelsmann Foundation; Öxcan Karadeniz, Association of Binational Families and Partnerships; and Nina Mühe from CLAIM.
The Central Committee of German Catholics (ZdK) issued a declaration directed against Islamophobia under the title No to Hate and Incitement - Christians and Muslims together against Islamophobia. In this way, the ZdK wants to make an interreligious contribution to social dialogue.258

The German government has taken some long-needed steps against the spread of racism, anti-Semitism, and Islamophobia. These include the Network Enforcement Act (NetzDG), which came into force in 2017, the separate recording of Islamophobic crimes in the police crime statistics of the Federal Criminal Police Office, the appointment of an Independent Group of Experts on Muslimophobia, and a catalogue of measures to combat right-wing extremism and racism. Creating laws and measures is one thing, but implementing them is another. Although every year there are over thousands of racist attacks on Muslims and migrants, and hundreds of attacks on mosques and religious sites, hardly any arrests or investigations are carried out. The same goes for hate speech in the media and social networks. No one knows how many people suffer discrimination and Islamophobia on a daily basis because Germany-wide independent reporting centres are either understaffed or do not exist at all. The state institutions such as security agencies or school authorities, which should be considered hotlines, suffer from structural racism themselves. In addition to proper prosecution of racism, which is also particularly important, there is a need to invest in victim education, awareness campaigns, and democratic education that is equal and free of racism. Suggestions for improvement in the individual areas of life for combating Islamophobia and discrimination are explained below.

- The authorities must strengthen human rights education in the school system with special attention to diversity, equity, and democracy. Improved training for teachers who teach students from different backgrounds and cultures is required.
- The authorities must also strengthen cooperation between the judiciary and security authorities with the aim of enabling prosecution toward the conviction of physical and verbal Islamophobia and discrimination, as well as hate speech and incitement of individuals or groups.
- In order to be able to fight structural racism in the state authorities, studies for possible racism, xenophobia, and Islamophobia should be conducted not only in the police, but also in the school system, the military, the Federal Employment Agency (BA), and the health system.

• The Federal Anti-Discrimination Agency should be fully independent and well-funded. Independent equality bodies should also be established in federal states.
• Measures should be considered to reduce discrimination in the labour market, and anonymous application procedures should be implemented.
• In the last two years, weapon caches and attack plans of right-wing extremist groups and individuals are being discovered more frequently. With the increase in gun ownership and illegal importation by right-wing extremists, we are seeing more right-wing terrorist attacks on Muslims and Jews. There should be a strict ban on gun ownership across all of Germany. Especially unstable individuals, like the terrorist of Hanau, should not be able to get gun licenses.
• The representation of people with an immigrant background in sectors such as media, police, academia, politics, etc. is not proportional to their share in the population. Only quotas like those that exist in the U.S. or Canada can eliminate the disadvantage of migrants and their children.

Chronology

• 26.01.2020: According to the president of the Military Counterintelligence Service (MAD), Christof Gramm, there are 550 suspected cases of right-wing extremism in the Bundeswehr. The Special Forces Command is particularly hard hit, he said. In June of the same year, the number of suspected cases will rise to over 600.
• 05.02.2020: According to a study conducted in Hesse, 28% of police officers fear Islam.
• 16.02.2020: A right-wing terrorist cell was planning a terrorist attack on a mosque modelled on the Christchurch attack. Following the raids, 12 right-wing extremists were arrested in six German states.
• 18.02.2020: AfD politician Björn Höcke took part in PEGIDA’s 200th rally. Höcke was invited by PEGIDA to give a speech on stage.
• 19.02.2020: During an event of the AfD-NRW colouring books with racist content were distributed. In the colouring books, people with weapons are shown in a motorcade under the Turkish flag.
• 20.02.2020: In a right-wing terrorist attack in Hanau, 9 people with an immigrant background were killed and several injured. The terrorist also shot his mother and himself.
• 01.03.2020: The Fatih Mosque in Bremen received a threatening letter with racist and Islamophobic threats. In addition, a powdery substance was scattered in it. According to the police investigation, the substance was not dangerous.
• 18.05.2020: A group of about 15 to 20 youths insulted and beat up several asylum seekers in a park in Brandenburg. The asylum seekers are from Guinea and Morocco.

• 24.06.2020: In Leipzig, a person of Syrian origin was attacked by four men. While the victim was on the road, the four men shouted xenophobic and right-wing extremist slogans at him and assaulted him.

• 27.07.2020: A number of famous people with an immigrant background, such as cabaret artist Idil Baydar, lawyer Seda Başay-Yıldız, or German politicians like Hesse’s Left Party parliamentary group leader Janine Wissler, received threatening letters with the signature NSU 2.0. Their personal data was retrieved from computers at the Wiesbaden or Frankfurt police headquarters.

Executive Summary

The situation with regard to Islamophobia in Greece in 2020 did not change significantly compared to the previous years based on all the existing findings. Islamophobia is primarily found on the discursive level while physical attacks with religious motivation targeting mosques, cemeteries, Muslim migrants or refugees, which are actually difficult to record, remain fewer compared to other European countries. Politics, religion, media, and the Internet are the four primary realms that continued to play a significant role in the reproduction of Islamophobia in the public domain throughout 2020 without major differentiations from previous years. Islamophobia in Greece was expressed by political parties and politicians of the right and extreme right, (self-proclaimed) neoliberals, figures of the Orthodox Church of Greece, printed and electronic media, and journalists including their posts on social media.

The main issues that contributed to the reproduction of Islamophobia in 2020 were the so-called immigration/refugee problem, the conflictual situation which emerged at the Greek-Turkish borders in February-March, the negative attitudes toward refugees who reside in Athens and some of the Aegean islands, and the discussions and decisions on the transfer of migrants and refugees from the islands to the mainland. Another issue that gave spark to anti-Islamic reactions at various levels was the decision of the Turkish government to alter the use of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul from a museum to a mosque. This led to another wave of not only anti-Turkish views and attitudes, but of openly Islamophobic content. Finally, the opening of the ‘official’ Mosque of Athens in November a few days after the deadly terrorist attacks in Paris, Nice (October 2020) and Vienna (November 2020) sparked a series of Islamophobic narratives.
Περίληψη
Η κατάσταση όσον αφορά την ισλαμοφοβία στην Ελλάδα το 2020 δεν έχει μεταβληθεί ριζικά συγκριτικά με τα προηγούμενα χρόνια με βάση όλα τα διαθέσιμα ευρήματα. Η ισλαμοφοβία εντοπίζεται πρωτίστως στο επίπεδο του δημόσιου λόγου, ενώ βίαιες επιθέσεις με θρησκευτικά κίνητρα με στόχο τζαμιά, νεκροταφεία, μουσουλμάνους μετανάστες ή πρόσφυγες, οι οποίες στην πραγματικότητα είναι δύσκολα να καταγραφούν, εξακολουθούν να λαμβάνουν χώρα αλλά παραμένουν λιγότερες σε σύγκριση με άλλες ευρωπαϊκές χώρες. Η πολιτική, η θρησκεία, το Διαδίκτυο, η θρησκεία, τα μέσα ενημέρωσης και το Διαδίκτυο είναι τα τέσσερα βασικά πεδία τα οποία συνέχισαν να διαδραματίζουν σημαντικό ρόλο στην αναπαραγωγή της ισλαμοφοβίας στον δημόσιο χώρο καθ’ όλη τη διάρκεια του 2020. Συγκεκριμένα η ισλαμοφοβία εκφράστηκε από ορισμένα πολιτικά κόμματα και πολιτικούς της δεξιάς και της ακροδεξιάς, ορισμένους (αυτοαποκλαυμένους) νεο-φιλελεύθερους, ορισμένους εκπροσώπους της Ορθόδοξης Εκκλησίας της Ελλάδας, ορισμένους έντυπους και ηλεκτρονικούς μέσα ενημέρωσης και δημοσιογράφους, συμπεριλαμβανομένων των δημοσιογράφων τους στα κοινωνικά δίκτια. Τα κύρια ζητήματα που συνέβαλαν στην αναπαραγωγή της ισλαμοφοβίας το 2020 ήταν το λεγόμενο «μεταναστευτικό/προσφυγικό πρόβλημα», κυρίως στη συγκρουσιακή κατάσταση που έλαβε χώρα στα ελληνοτουρκικά σύνορα κατά τους μήνες Φεβρουαρίου-Μάρτιου, η παρουσία μεταναστών και προσφύγων στην Αθήνα και στα νησιά του Αιγαίου, καθώς και οι συζητήσεις και αποφάσεις για τη μεταφορά μεταναστών και προσφύγων από τα νησιά στην ηπειρωτική Ελλάδα. Ένα δεύτερο ζήτημα που προκάλεσε αντι-ισλαμικές αντιδράσεις σε διάφορη επίπεδα ήταν η απόφαση της τουρκικής κυβέρνησης να τροποποιήσει τη χρήση της Αγίας Σοφίας στην Κωνσταντινούπολη από μουσείο σε τζαμί, γεγονός που έδρασε σε όλες τις αγγέλιες και στάσεις όχι μόνο αντιτουρκικών, αλλά και με έναν ανοιχτά ισλαμοφοβικό περιεχόμενο. Τέλος, το άνοιγμα του 'επίσημου' τζαμιού της Αθήνα του Νοεμβρίου, λίγες ημέρες μετά τις τρομοκρατικές χτυπήματα στο Παρίσι, τη Νίκαια (Οκτώβριος 2020) και τη Βιέννη (Νοεμβρίου 2020), πυροδότησε μια νέα σειρά Ισλαμοφοβικών αφηγήσεων.
Country Profile
EIR 2020

Country: Greece

Type of Regime: Parliamentary Republic

Form of Government: The prime minister is the head of government. The president, elected by the parliament every five years, is the head of state. The president of the republic has limited political power, as most power lies with the government.

Ruling Parties: Nea Dimocratia (New Democracy)

Opposition Parties: SYRIZA (Coalition of the Radical Left), KINAL (Movement of Change), KKE (Greek Communist Party), Elliniki Lissi (Greek Solution), MERA25

Last Elections: 2019 Parliamentary Elections: Nea Dimocratia (New Democracy) 39.85% (158 seats); SYRIZA (Coalition of the Radical Left) 31.53% (86 seats); KINAL (Movement of Change) 8.1% (22 seats); KKE (Greek Communist Party) 5.13% (15 seats); Elliniki Lissi (Greek Solution) 3.7% (10 seats); MERA25 3.44% (9 seats).

Total Population: 10,816,286 in 2011 (national census)

Major Languages: Greek

Official Religion: Eastern Orthodox Church

Statistics on Islamophobia: No statistics on Islamophobia available

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: Annual data is made available in the following year. The Racist Violence Recording Network in 2019 reported 100 racist incidents with more than 104 victims, while in 2018 it recorded 117 incidents with more than 130 victims. In 51 incidents, the victims were migrants or refugees who were assaulted on grounds of ethnic origin, religion, and colour; associations of third country nationals; and human rights defenders as a result of their connection with refugees and migrants. The Police Department against Racist Violence recorded 282 incidents with probable racist motive for 2019, while in 2018 the department recorded 226 incidents.

Major Religions (% of Population): There is no official data available, since religious affiliation is not included in the national census. According to the World Values Survey (WVS) (2018) Orthodox Christians comprise 91% of the population, people with no religion comprise 3.8%, other Christians 0.6%, Muslims 2.9%, and other religions 0.8%.

Muslim Population (% of Population): There is no official data available, since religious affiliation is not included in the national census. Apart from the WVS mentioned above, a Pew Research Institute poll (2016) estimates Muslims at 5.7% of the population.
Main Muslim Community Organisations: Muslim Association of Greece, Xanthi Turkish Union, Association of Religious Staff of Western Thrace Mosques, Association of Western Thracian Graduates of Imam Hatip High Schools, Shia Muslim Community of Greece

Introduction

The situation with regard to Islamophobia and anti-Muslim attitudes in Greece in 2020 did not change significantly compared to the previous years. Islamophobia is primarily found on the discursive level while physical attacks with religious motivation targeting mosques, cemeteries, Muslim migrants or refugees, which are actually difficult to record, remain fewer compared to other European countries. Politics, religion, media, and the Internet are the four primary realms that continued to play a significant role in the reproduction of Islamophobia in the public domain throughout 2020 without major differentiations from previous years from previous years. In 2020, Islamophobia in Greece was expressed by political parties and politicians of the right and extreme right, (self-proclaimed) neoliberals, figures of the Orthodox Church of Greece, printed and electronic media, and journalists including their posts on social media. The main issues that contributed to the reproduction of Islamophobia in 2020 were the so-called immigration/refugee problem, the conflictual situation which emerged in the Greek-Turkish borders in February-March, the negative attitudes toward refugees who reside in Athens and some of the Aegean islands, and the discussions and decisions on the transfer of migrants and refugees from the islands to the mainland. A second issue that gave spark to anti-Islamic reactions at various levels was the decision of the Turkish government to alter the use of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul from a museum to a mosque. This led to another wave of not only anti-Turkish views and attitudes, but of openly Islamophobic content, which is discussed in the current report. Finally, the opening of the ‘official’ Mosque of Athens in November a few days after the deadly terrorist attacks in Paris, Nice (October 2020) and Vienna (November 2020) sparked a series of Islamophobic narratives. This report is based on data collected in 2020 and takes into account local, national, and international events that might have influenced the (re)appearance or the rise of Islamophobia. The material was mainly collected from printed and electronic media, websites and blogs, reports by NGOs, international organisations and state authorities, and formal or informal contacts with members of the Muslim communities.1

1. It is worth noting that Greece has been included in the OSCE Hate Crimes reporting mechanism since 2012. Apart from official statistical data from the Greek state, some minority and majority NGOs dealing with human and minority rights in Greece contribute by reporting Islamophobic actions to this mechanism. The Western Thrace Minority University Graduates Association and the Western Thrace Turks Federation in Europe primarily report on biases against Muslims in Western Thrace, Rhodes, and Kos, while the Greek Helsinki Monitor and Racist Violence Recording Network offer reports on Muslims in the rest of Greece.
Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

There was no change during 2020 with regard to the statistical documentation of Islamophobic incidents in Greece. What this means is that despite the need to collect and categorise physical and verbal attacks against Muslims and Islamic places, no initiative was taken towards this direction, leading to a significant gap in the collected data on racism and xenophobia. It is obvious that a broader but crucial issue with regard to Islamophobia is that it is not always easy to document the motives behind racist attacks against migrants and refugees, although in many cases such motives directly or indirectly underlie the attacks. That said, one should not neglect the fact that while targeting Muslim immigrants is not rare within Greek society, the religious background and motive are not always clearly stated and easily documented.

Similarly to the previous reports, an effort has been made to collect all relevant information with regard to physical and verbal attacks against Muslims and Islamic places through personal contacts, media, NGO reports, and Muslims’ own disclosure of relevant instances. In 2020, a series of violent attacks against Muslim migrants and refugees were recorded in major Greek cities (e.g. Athens) and especially on the islands that host refugee camps. However, when these attacks are reported, the religious motive usually is not recorded. The Racist Violence Recording Network in its latest report recorded 51 incidents. Those targeted in these incidents were migrants, refugees, or asylum-seekers on the grounds of ethnic origin, religion and/or colour; human rights defenders as a result of their connection with refugees and migrants; accommodation sites for unaccompanied minors; and in one incident, the target was a Muslim cemetery. In one of the cases recorded by the network the following is mentioned,

Week after week, whenever he saw us outside, myself and my girlfriends, he was harassing us [...] we could understand that he was insulting us in Greek [...] before going into the apartment building, he saw me at the entrance and pushed me back violently [...] to one of my girlfriends he pulled her headscarf to take it off [...] while I was waiting at the bus stop, he suddenly hit me on the head and told me “Muslim no good.”

One of the authors of the report was an eyewitness to a similar incident in central Athens, in Pagrati, on June 25, 2020, at a bus stop. A Muslim family consisting of both parents and two small children, the woman wearing a headscarf, was waiting for the bus. A man, in his 50s passed by, looked at them with aversion, and swore three times in Greek, “Fuck Islam”. Such incidents are usually mentioned by Muslims in informal conversations or research interviews regarding Islamophobia and racism. Sometimes Muslims themselves publicise Islamophobic incidents. In one such case the story of a Muslim woman who argued that she and her child had been treated this way was made public through a website that is run by Muslims, while in another case the administrator of the website openly stated that he has received threatening messages by right-wing extremists following a publication on one of his blogs.4

Here, it is useful to note that there is no single NGO in Greece founded for the purpose of fighting Islamophobia in the country. All the NGOs stated here tackle physical and verbal Islamophobic attacks under main principles of human rights such as equality and non-discrimination.

In September, conflicts between Greeks and migrants erupted on the island of Crete with regard to economic differences at a local enterprise. A few days later, a demonstration was organised by the locals against the migrants. After the demonstration, a group of Greeks attacked the migrants’ prayer house, while there were reports of three people being injured during the incidents.5 Another attack took place in the city of Xanthi, where the window belonging to the electricity meter of the Hürriyet Mosque was smashed.6

In a case in Thessaloniki, a video recording emerged of a Greek obliging a Muslim migrant to make the symbol of the cross and pray in Greek. The incident led to the local public persecutor’s intervention asking for the video to be examined so that the person be found and arrested based on anti-racist legislation.7

After the implementation of Turkey’s decision to convert Hagia Sophia museum in Istanbul into a mosque, groups of people reacted in Greece vandalising a historic Ottoman mosque in Trikala in Central Greece, by throwing stones and breaking the glass on the front door. (Fig. 1)

!Figure 1: The front door of Kursum (Kurşunlu)/Osman Shah Mosque in Trikala, Thessaly, after the attack.
Similarly, the minaret of the historical Diomidia (Hemitli) Mosque, located close to the city of Xanthi, was attacked in July by unidentified person(s) causing severe damage to the structure. (Fig. 2) The mosque is among the mosques in Greece that need immediate restoration so as not to collapse fully.

Another violent incident was the attack by a group on a Muslim tourist of Danish citizenship in July in central Athens while the police stood nearby and did not react. The victim was severely injured and needed to be taken to hospital for medical attention.

In addition to these attacks, a series of demonstrations across Greece targeted Islam and Muslims while all the time claiming to be against the Islamisation of Greece and illegal migration. On May 10, a demonstration against the Islamisation of Greece was organised in Thessaloniki with the participation of Golden Dawn. (Fig. 3)

On May 15, a series of demonstrations were organised by extreme-right groups, Covid-19 deniers, and anti-vaxxers in various cities around Greece such as Athens,

Thessaloniki, Volos, Patra, Rhodes, and Kastoria. Among the nine points/themes of the demonstrations, two were directly related to Islam and Muslims. Point Six was related to “[t]he continuous flows of illegal migrants in our islands and the alienation of the population” and Point Seven stated, “We say ‘Yes’ to the Holy Communion and open churches, we say ‘No’ to the Islamisation of the country”.12

Finally, demonstrations were organised against the relocation of migrants and refugees from the islands to the mainland. In one such demonstration, in Macedonia, the local authorities and citizens reacted to such a possibility by arguing,

We don’t want them to be relocated here permanently, so that we and our children should live next to 2,500 Muslims. Tomorrow they might ask for a mosque and perhaps the day after tomorrow they will elect a mayor. […] No to the Islamisation of Paionia.13

It is very interesting that even priests were present in this gathering, arguing that the relocation of migrants and refugees is an organised conquering and that eventually this ‘national’ problem will become a ‘religious’ one.14 (Fig. 4)

A slightly different display of Islamophobia took place in the city of Didymoticho. A Greek flag was hung on the minaret of the city’s historical mosque. Based on the statements of the mayor, it was taken down in the morning.16

Overall, the lack of an observatory mechanism to monitor anti-Islamic physical and/or verbal attacks or a more specific section within the current structures (state or civil society) is a severe barrier in the effort to document and, as consequence, to confront Islamophobia in Greek society.

Apart from the above incidents that are clear expressions of Islamophobia, there are other cases as well that despite not being included in the categorisation of Islamophobia, are perceived as such by members of the Muslim communities in Greece. In June, the Greek government closed down one of the oldest sites of prayer for Muslims in Piraeus.\(^\text{17}\) The decision was based on the lack of a state permit and as such it could be argued that it is not an attack on Islam and Muslims. However, due to the continuous delays in the opening of the official Mosque of Athens, such a decision was seen as Islamophobic by a section of the community that believed this to be an infringement of their freedom of religion by the Greek state. In another case, on August 13, a group of fully equipped soldiers from the Greek Special Forces conducted a military exercise at the entrance of the village of Sminthi (Gökçepinar) in the mountains of Xanthi. The operation took place next to the village's Muslim cemetery and caused anxiety and discomfort among villagers since neither the local authorities nor the villagers had been informed beforehand.\(^\text{18}\)

Employment

With regard to employment because of the lack of any official data on religious discrimination in the job market, it is not possible to provide an overview. Based on the sources available, the media, and personal communication, there appear to be no records on any official level (NGOs and/or the state authorities) about relevant incidents.

Education

Similarly to last year, in regard to education and in relation to the policies implemented by the Ministry of Education, the ministry has recorded no direct Islamophobic incidents. However, there are certain issues related to education that should be mentioned. The most important one again is related to the reactions against the integration of refugee and migrant children in the Greek educational system. In some regions of Greece, in the islands and the mainland, reactions were recorded although not to the same extent as in the first years when the programme of the incorporation of the children in schools started. This year, the parents’ reactions were also related to the Covid-19 pandemic. In one such case, in the town of Mytilene, the capital of Lesbos, parents published an open letter arguing that they didn’t want migrant children to go to the same school as their children because of the high number of Covid-19 cases among the migrants and refugees on the island.19

Related to the above, there was a directive circulated by the Ministry of Education and Religious Affairs that stated that in order to attend school, migrant children were required to take a Covid-19 test and bring the result to school.20 However, the document caused the reaction of the opposition that characterised it as racist, and this led to the ministry stepping back and withdrawing it and the relevant guidance sent to schools.21

Politics

One of the main political proponents of anti-Islamic rhetoric inside and outside the Greek Parliament is the new actor in the extreme-right milieu, i.e. the party of Greek Solution and its leader Kyriakos Velopoulos. Through his speeches in the parliament, parliamentary questions, and question in the European Parliament, where the party is also represented, Greek Solution tries to urge the government and Greek society against Islam and Muslims. The main arguments are that Turkey’s plan is to Islamise Greece; that the government party of New Democracy despises Orthodoxy, but extends immunity to Islam; and that people should know how Muslim organisations are being funded.22 The party also submitted a law proposal as an addition to the existing anti-racist legislation in order to combat, as it was argued, ‘Christianophobia’ and blasphemy against the Orthodox religion. The proposal’s introductory essay mentions,

Lately the term ‘Islamophobia’ has been circulated as an accusation against all those who might criticise Islamism and arguing that they supposedly incite hatred of Islam as a cultural difference. But when Christianity is ‘attacked’ by all means, acts and words, when for every social, economic, political and any other problem, Christianity and the Church are being accused, this conceals in the same way hatred of the Christian religion and its believers.23

Apart from Greek Solution, Golden Dawn, despite its fall and conviction in a court of law, continues to reproduce anti-Islamic discourse. Meanwhile, in June 2020, the former Golden Dawn MP and elected member of the Municipal Council of Athens, Ilias Kassidiaris, founded his new extreme-right wing party, Ellines gia tin Patrida (Greeks for the Fatherland). The party’s main theses were made public on its official website and apart from the main slogan of ‘Greece belongs to the Greeks’, two points should be mentioned, namely points two and ten below.

2. A definite confrontation of illegal migration
Deportation of all foreigners who are living illegally in Greece and have turned our country into an Islamic colony. A definite end of the free housing, money assistance, and all the privileges the government of Nea Dimocratia (New Democracy) offers generously to foreigners.

10. Greek Education
‘The foundation of each city is the education of the youth’, Pythagoras taught. On the contrary Kissinger, who was against the Greeks, used to say that ‘Greeks should be attacked upon their roots, i.e. their language, religion and spiritual and historical resources’. Against this international conspiracy towards Hellenism we need to preserve the eternal values of the Greek Education by all means. We need to learn every aspect of our history, so that in the future we will be able to live moments of great glory; we need to preserve our Civilization and our Traditions; to defend Orthodoxy against the great threat of Islamisation.24

In September, an MP of the right-wing ruling party of New Democracy, who is known for his extreme views and opinions, asked a question in the Greek Parliament about the wearing of burqa and niqab by Muslim women in Greece, especially in the streets of Athens. He stated,

It is of high concern and more common in Greece -especially in the Athenian centre- the image of women who follow the Muslim dressing, burqa and niqab, which cover their whole bodies, their head and face, leaving only the eyes free in some cases. Although the burqa and niqab are being worn based on an Islamic order, the state is not interested in that from a religious point of view. However, the burqa and niqab consist at the same time a security problem, since they can make anyone invisible to other citizens and the authorities, while at the same time they violate women’s rights, when they are obliged to wear them, via intimidation and repression, something completely unacceptable for the country’s dominant culture and its legal culture. […] Since Greece is and owes to continue to be a safe country, where women are absolutely equal and free citizens, I ask you Mr. Minister [of Justice]: The female Muslim dressing of burqa and niqab, which hide from public view all human characteristics, are they an issue of public and parliamentary deliberation, towards a legal resolution of the problems they create?25

24. For these theses see: ellhnes.net/thesis-1, (Access date: 17 October 2020).
In May 2020, the government appointed a number of new directors to the refugee camps in different parts of the country. Among them, was an individual who had written extensively on Islam and Muslims, reproducing stereotypes and Islamophobic views. For example, he mentions female circumcision without clarifying that this has nothing to do with Islam; he argued that Islam is not a religion of peace using images of Muslims wearing masks and holding a rifle in one hand and the Koran in the other. In addition, he published a book under the title Minarets: The Spears of Islam in Europe with a front cover that is inspired by the anti-minaret campaign in Switzerland and a photo that was regularly reproduced by Islamophobic and extreme-right wing groups in social media.26 (Fig. 5)

!Figure 5: The front cover of the book by Christos Tsiachris, Minarets: The Spears of Islam in Europe, Athens, Thoule Books, 2014.

A very interesting case is the self-proclaimed liberal party of Dimiurgia Xana (Creation Again) and its leader Thanos Tzimeros. This is a party of neoliberal economic ideology, but with strong identitarian elements. The party originally started as an openly neoliberal one and to a great extent it is, but only on the economic level. However, in the last years, the party’s leader has developed a strong nationalistic public discourse which is primarily characterized by racism, xenophobia, and Islamophobia, proceeding also to collaborations and synergies with other radical-right parties like the aforementioned New Right and its leader Failos Kranidiotis. Dimiurgia Xana is a very interesting hybrid of economic and political ideology. In January 2020, the party and its leader participated in a demonstration at Syntagma Square, Athens against migration. (Fig. 6)

In its press release regarding the demonstration, the party wrote,

[...] in their vast majority the invaders are Muslims. Islam, we have repeatedly underlined it, is not only a religion. It is a legal-social-military system totally incompatible with European values, which under the pretext of religion and exploiting the tolerance of the Western culture tries to conquer it from the inside [...] We want to live with our culture, our traditions, our mores and customs, with our positive and negative features. We don’t want our country, 200 years after the Greek Revolution [of 1821, against the Ottoman Occupation], to start becoming a Muslim colony.29

Finally, at a local level, as was mentioned in the first section of the report, local authorities have been reacting against the possibility of relocating migrants and refugees from the islands to the mainland, and with regard to other issues like the Hagia Sophia case in Istanbul. In one such case in Katerini, Macedonia, a meeting was organised with the participation of local authorities to discuss the rise in numbers of Muslim migrants and refugees in the region. The arguments were as follows,

There is a problem in the whole city of Katerini, because Katerini is touristic and the image that a person will see after nine o’clock in the night in the city centre, is Muslim families with 5-6 kids each one and female Muslims with headscarves being everywhere in the area and this is not the best for tourism in the region.30

In another example, the prefect of the North Aegean Sea, after the conversion of Hagia Sophia museum in Istanbul into a mosque, officially asked the Greek government to stop all the restoration works of the Ottoman-era Valide Mosque on the island of Lesvos, which had been initiated in 2017, as a measure of retaliation.\textsuperscript{31}

Media

Unsurprisingly, Islamophobic views and articles are regularly published in extreme-right newspapers such as Golden Dawn, Makeleio, Stohos, Eleftheros Kosmos, and Eleftheri Ora which are among the most well-known and influential in the extreme-right milieu. In most of cases, the main issues are the so-called illegal migration and the ensuing threat of the biological and cultural alienation of the Greek nation and society. As expected, the explosive situation at the Greek-Turkish borders in March gave the extreme-right press the opportunity to reproduce even conspiracy theory scenarios such as that “mass murders by rioting illegal migrants” will soon take place, that “the enemy is already inside, they [i.e. dark powers] ask from the illegal migrants to riot all over the country”, or even that “illegal migrants-jihadists are ready to blow up basic electricity and water infrastructures in big cities”. (Fig. 7)

However, there are also other media which do not belong to the extreme right, but nevertheless reproduce anti-Islamic views and stereotypes. One such example in 2020 was a sports newspaper, Sportime, which on at least two occasions reproduced Islamophobic views. On one occasion, it was reported that Muslims ate a dog and that this is something that is not incompatible to their religion, which is false, while on a different occasion the newspaper, although ostensibly a sports publica-

The newspaper Dimokratia has also reproduced similar views with regard to Islam and migration often on its front page. (Fig. 9)

The terror attacks in Paris, Nice (October 2020) and Vienna (November 2020) in combination with the opening of the mosque in Athens influenced media discourses, which up to that point displayed a different picture. In two other examples shown below, the threat of Islam was presented in newspapers of different backgrounds – a gossip/lifestyle newspaper and one of the political centre. (Figs. 11 and 12)

Apart from the abovementioned media, there are also others which are considered of a liberal or centrist political ideology that nevertheless regularly host opinion pieces by self-proclaimed liberals who openly express Islamophobic views and stereotypes. Since these articles are written by specific people, they will be discussed in the section on the central figures of the country’s Islamophobia network. However, in one such case, the liberal newspaper Kathimerini hosted an article by a constitutional law professor and the honorary vice-president of the Council of State who openly argued that Islam is not compatible with democracy.

As a consequence, there is no chance that Muslims would accept any democratic value, neither do they want to fall under the western rules of democratic government, since their religion regulates their everyday life, and that is why every effort of the great powers to ‘democratise’ Muslim countries failed. This is also because democracy cannot be implemented by the use of the guns. For Muslims, then, the Enlightenment that will turn against their religion and upgrade them culturally will take very long!39

When it comes to the justice system, Islamophobic incidents mentioned either by Muslims or reported in the media have not been recorded. On the other hand, the Greek Helsinki Monitor has proceeded to a series of lawsuits against individuals (e.g. politicians, journalists) who reproduce Islamophobic rhetoric and hate speech in their public discourse (e.g. texts, articles, Internet). Until the end of year, none of these lawsuits made it to court. However, in the summer, a court convicted a member of an extreme-right terrorist organisation (Crypteia) for the attack perpetrated in 2018 against the offices of the Union of Afghan Migrants and Refugees in Athens recognising and accepting the racist motive behind the attack. The accused was convicted to five years imprisonment but was set free until the appealed case is tried in a higher court. In addition, and although also not related directly to Islamophobia, Golden Dawn, the neo-Nazi political party, was convicted in October as a criminal organisation and for organising a series of racist attacks, including the murder of

For that purpose, young Spartans with knives were sent out during the night to assassinate slaves in order to create fear among them.

Internet

The Internet and social media, in particular, have been a fertile ground for the reproduction of Islamophobic views and hate speech against Islam and Muslims, especially when it comes to migrants and refugees.46 While it is difficult to monitor the whole field in a systematic manner, similarly to the previous years’ reports, many extreme right wing websites continue to disseminate news about Muslim countries in relation to violence (e.g. killings, rapes, murders, etc.), which in most cases are not reliable, and to argue that the “Islamisation” of Greece is taking place.47 These kinds of views, ideological texts, messages, and comments are primarily used in order to cultivate and impose the fear of Islam and create a repulsive image of Islam and Muslims. Such websites include, of course, the official website of GD (xrisiavgi.com); ethnikismos.net, which is related to GD, since many articles appear on both websites; the websites of other extreme-right parties (elasyn.com and elliniki-lisi.gr); the website of a journalist, writer, and Turcologist (sic), i.e. a specialist in the study of Turkish history and society, and Greek-Turkish relations, (nikosxeiladakis.gr), in which a special section is dedicated to Islam; and, of course, all the websites of the newspapers mentioned in the media section of the report which belong to the extreme right (stoxos.gr, makeleio.gr, elora.gr, elkosmos.gr). Finally, there are many Facebook and Twitter accounts, both personal pages and groups, which reproduce messages, videos, and texts against migrants and refugees and, of course, against multiculturalism, Islam, and Muslims and the construction of the mosque in Athens. A couple of examples are a Facebook page about ‘illegal’ migrants and the danger they pose to Greece under the name ‘Lathro’ which means ‘smuggled’, ‘illegal’ and is the first part of the word ‘lathrometanastis’, i.e. illegal, smuggled migrant. Another account is under the name ‘Islam in front of our doors’, underlying the danger of Islam for Greece and Greek culture.48

In addition, it has to be noted that especially in social media, fake news with regard to Islam and Muslims and more particularly migrants and refugees is being reproduced. In most cases, fake news about migrants and refugees on the Greek islands and about the way other countries have been dealing with Islam (e.g. Japan) is reproduced. Almost all this fake news is disseminated via extreme-right blogs, websites, and social media pages. In many cases, these stories have been exposed as such by a Greek website that debunks hoaxes and fake news.49

In the above sections some of the most important figures in the Islamophobia network have already been mentioned, especially when it comes to the extreme right, such as Kyriakos Velopoulos, Ilias Kassidiaris, and Nikos Heiladakis. Apart from the extreme right, another field where one can find some of the key Islamophobic figures is neoliberalism, e.g. Thanos Tzimeros, the leader of Dimiourgia Xana (Creation Again), who has also been mentioned above. However, there is another point that needs to be underlined. After the publication of last year’s EIR report, Tzimeros uploaded a post on his Facebook page accusing the authors of the report as traitors and announced the establishment of an observatory which will observe the activity of those who document Islamophobia in Greece – as of yet this is not known to have been established.50

Another central figure is Andreas Andrianopoulos, a neoliberal and former minister with the right-wing party New Democracy. In the last years, he has written articles and books, and made lots of comments mainly on Twitter and on Facebook openly expressing his anti-Islamic and anti-Muslim views and suggestions. His opinion pieces are also hosted on mainstream online news media like in.gr. A sample of his articles are the following: “Who Is a Refugee?”, where he asks the question, “Why only Muslim migrants come to Greece? Why are they mostly young people? Why have the great flows of migrants from everywhere started with the appearance of the Islamic State? Who is financing the movement of so many ‘unaccompanied minors’

50. “Observatory of the Fifth Column”, 22 June 2020, https://cutt.ly/CgIbiZT (Access date: 20 October 2020). The post included the authors’ photos and accused them as fifth-column members, as traitors, etc. Tzimenos did not use any academic or other ideological arguments to respond to the report, he just argued that his followers should learn about the authors’ activities; that they are paid by the EU and Turkey to promote Islamophobia as a concept; and he asked his followers to help him establish an observatory mechanism so that all Greek patriots learn about such anti-Greek initiatives like the EIR. The comments on his page were not polite towards the authors; they called them traitors, that they will pay for their actions in the future, that they are George Soros’s instruments, bastards, homosexuals, mentally ill, etc. Insults were also made targeting their families. There were several instances that the police’s Cyber Crime Division could have easily intervened. In addition, the post was disseminated and retweeted by many extreme-right personal pages, making the authors targets for broader extreme-right audiences.
and why? Some answers are necessary…”; “Erdogan, Islam and Crusades”, where he argues that the Crusades took place because of the aggressiveness of Islam; “Islamic Imperialism”; and “Is Islam Compatible with Democracy?”, where predictably he argues that it isn’t.\footnote{All the articles are published in in.gr. See: cutt.ly/egbMrXr, cutt.ly/7gbMryT, cutt.ly/QgbM9C, and cutt.ly/bgbM0nW (Access date: 20 October 2020).}

Soti Triantafyllou is another neoliberal key figure when it comes to Islamophobia in the public sphere. Her articles continuously reproduce anti-Islamic opinions making ample use of her favorite term which seems to be ‘Islamo-fascism’.

Today Europe not only underestimates Islamo-fascism, but it considers it as a ‘justified’ and ‘equal’ global factor with which it should and could communicate both at the state level, e.g. Turkey, and community (‘minorities’) level within the European borders.\footnote{Soti Triantafyllou, “Chickens with Combs”, Athensvoice, 17 July 2020, cutt.ly/PglQrkS, (Access date: 20 October 2020). The title of the article loosely translates as “Extreme Cowards”.}

In an interview she gave after the terrorist attack in Paris, she argued,

All European leaders behaved like little people, for decades they counted the votes and wanted to go to paradise by doing good deeds. The good deeds for the ‘Muslims’ turned out to be bad for all the others. They did not take into account the basics: that Islam is not a ‘culture’, it is an aggressive religion and imperialist policy.\footnote{“Soti Triandafyllou: Islam and Islamo-Left Are Dissolving Little by Little Europe”, Liberal, 27 October 2020, https://cutt.ly/1gJHAjO (Access date: 7 November 2020).}

Apart from political ideologies, another field where one can find Islamophobic views is that of religion and more particularly the Orthodox Church of Greece. Clarifying from the very beginning that the Church on the whole and the Holy Synod have never taken an open Islamophobic or anti-Muslim decision, several church figures have openly expressed such views in the last years. A figure who often reproduces Islamophobic public discourse is Metropolitan of Piraeus Serafeim, who stimulated by the conversion of Hagia Sophia museum into a mosque, argued one more time that “Islam is a fake religion, a human-made political, economic and military system of violence, of depredation, murder, crime, and fraud”.\footnote{Metropolitan of Piraeus Serafeim, “Greece Has to Respond Dynamically to the Sacrilege and Barbaric Transformation of the Great Church of Christ into a Mosque of the Fake Religion of Islam”, imp, 10 July 2020, rb.gy/u5mvvm, (Access date: 20 October 2020).}

According to Metropolitan of Konitsa Andreas, “Islam as we all can see nowadays, was and still is a religion that cultivates the inexorable hatred against the non-Muslim peoples”.\footnote{Metropolitan of Konitsa, “Islam Is Still a Religion That Cultivates Inexorable Hatred”, Romfea, 20 August 2020, cutt.ly/1glW3Yw, (Access date: 20 October 2020).} In addition, following the attempted murder of a Greek Orthodox priest in Lyon, France in October, a few days after the attacks in Paris and Nice (October 2020), the archbishop made a public statement arguing,
This horror transcends human reason. A religion arms the hands blinded by the hatred of terrorists. And extremely intolerant and fanatical people, fundamentalists of violence and death, use a religion as a sphere aimed at the heart of freedom, and in particular the religious freedom of others, as a weapon to eliminate all opposing views of every person in the civilized world who has the inalienable right to express it, as a knife that slaughters human rights.56

It was soon revealed that the attack against the Orthodox priest had nothing to do with terrorism, but the archbishop had already rushed to make a statement relating the attack to Islam. Regardless of the fact that the Orthodox Church as an organisation and the Holy Synod have never expressed Islamophobic views and opinions especially in relation to the Koran and Prophet Muhammad, it should be noted that such discourse has not been condemned by the church authorities either.

Observed Civil Society, Political Assessments and Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The principal state policy that could be considered as important in confronting Islamophobia and anti-Muslim hatred in 2020 was the programme of the Ministry of Education on the incorporation of refugee children that continued to be implemented in 2020 in various regions of Greece. This was despite the local reactions and obstacles, which, however, were fewer compared to the previous years. This said, the directive asking migrant/refugee children to take a Covid-19 test was not a decision towards this direction - on the contrary - but nevertheless the ministry withdrew it at the last moment.

On the political level the Ministry of Justice introduced the first draft of the National Action Plan against Racism and Bigotry. The draft was sent to human rights organisations for consultation and public deliberation. While this is a very important step, there is a crucial point of criticism that needs to be underlined: despite the fact that there are references to other forms of racism, intolerance, and bigotry, the draft of the National Plan makes no mention of Islamophobia or anti-Islamic views and attitudes. There are parts that refer to migrants and refugees, but there is no specific reference to Islam and Muslims and this was mentioned as a point of criticism by the Hellenic League for Human Rights in the process of reviewing the draft.57 In any case, racism against migrants and refuges has a clear religious and cultural element and is not neutral.

57. The draft received critical comments by A. Sakellariou, one of the current report’s authors.
A political decision that could assist in the confrontation of Islamophobia - although at the beginning it sparked Islamophobic public discourse - was the opening of the Mosque of Athens in November. The opening was pending for more than a year, and created grievances and sentiments of disappointment among Muslims. The General Secretary of Religions stated after the official opening, “One of the strongest messages of the mosque is the stable and clear condemnation of Islamophobia. Our country has nothing to fear of Islam”.58

Despite the fact that there no NGO’s and organisations specifically against Islamophobia, there are, however, civil society organisations like the Greek Helsinki Monitor mentioned previously that are trying to put pressure on state authorities with regard to Islamophobia through legal activism. On the media level, it should be mentioned that the Greek Centre of Educational Activity and Intercultural Communication participates in a European project59 “Get the Trolls Out” and has a special section with regard to the confrontation of Islamophobia in the media.60

Based on the above analysis it could be argued that Islamophobia in Greece in 2020 is almost at the same level as the previous year, although the lack of statistical data makes comparisons difficult. Islamophobia is primarily manifested in public discourse; groups of Greek citizens demonstrating against the ‘Islamisation’ of the country; programmes of political parties and politicians mainly of the extreme right; among certain higher clergy members of the Orthodox Church of Greece; and in platforms of the Greek media, particularly the Internet and social media, which are a fertile ground for the reproduction of Islamophobia. However, it is important to underline that Islamophobia in Greece is also found among self-proclaimed political and/or economic liberals - and not only in the extremes. There are, of course, political parties, politicians, and anti-racist groups mainly from the left opposing racist and Islamophobic discourses and discriminatory practices but their impact on the reproduction of Islamophobia in Greece remains quite limited. Also, reactions from parents of schoolchildren against the incorporation of migrant children continued to take place, but were fewer in number and smaller in impact compared to those of previous years. The four main incidents that produced large amounts of anti-Islamic discourse and attitudes in Greece were the migration/refugee issue, especially after March 2020 and the conflictual situation in the region of Evros, at the Greek-Turkish borders; the conversion of Hagia Sophia museum in Istanbul into a mosque; the opening of the Mosque of Athens; and the terror attacks in Paris, Nice, and Vienna. As a consequence, at the moment, the initiatives of civil society, academia, and media organisations through the implementation of relevant projects could actually play a more crucial role in the study and confrontation of Islamophobia, while the government should be more determined towards this direction.

Among the primary issues that need to be addressed with regard to monitoring and confronting Islamophobia are the following:

• First, a need that still hasn’t been met in order to confront Islamophobia is the establishment of an official observatory mechanism that will monitor and record Islamophobic incidents on the level of both discourse and physical attacks. A first step towards this direction would be the collaboration of existing state mechanisms and civil society networks in order to achieve a better level of Islamophobia monitoring.

• Second, the legal mechanism in Greece is not effectively tackling Islamophobia and the Greek law is not robust enough to discourage Islamophobic actions and more specifically hate speech.

• Third, the Orthodox Church of Greece should not only publicly disapprove of its metropolitans who insist on using Islamophobic discourse, but should also effectively discourage any attempt of reproduction of anti-Muslim hatred by its clerics.

• Fourth, even though Islam is an old religion in Greece dating back to the Ottoman times and the 14th century, knowledge about the fundamentals of Islam and Muslims remains highly limited, which provides another space for Islamophobia to flourish and grow inside the Greek society. For the same purpose, training seminars provided particularly for those journalists, teachers, police officers, coastguards, and other civil servants who have contact with Muslims should be implemented.

• Fifth, it is significant to remember that Muslims should not be excluded from decision-making mechanisms combating anti-Muslim hatred in Greece. An effective mechanism of dialogue and cooperation should immediately be established. A platform is necessary where views of Muslims will be taken fully into consideration by Greek decision makers in Greece’s fight against Islamophobia.

• Finally, changes must be incorporated into the draft of the National Action Plan against Racism and Bigotry, so that Islamophobia is clearly described and included in order to confront the phenomenon more effectively through public authorities, research projects, and relative policies.

Executive Summary

Anti-migration narratives that target Muslims in Hungary continue to be at the forefront of the FIDESZ national government agenda to reconstitute a climate of fear of those who would “invade” Europe. With the majority of the country’s media controlled by the government, the “migrant threat” that Hungary faces is reiterated effectively even when the numbers reflect a significantly different reality. Over the past years, the government has repeatedly emphasized the historical Christian identity of the country in its campaigns. Viktor Orbán, Hungary’s Prime Minister, is vocal in national and international channels about the rejection of the possibility of Muslims being integrated into Hungarian society. Only a day after discussing migration in Brussels with European Commission President Ursula von der Leyden, PM Orbán stated publicly that, “In Hungary, we don’t think a mixture of Muslim and Christian society could be a peaceful one and could provide security and a good life for people.”

The anti-migration campaign and securitization have been gradually extended from the constructed image of the “migrant other” to other enemies of the Hungarian illiberal state. The focus of the state’s campaign is on internal actors such as civil society organizations, independent media, the judiciary system, academic and cultural institutions, and political opposition parties. Although figures on hate crimes in Hungary are reported and collected, the Hungarian Working Group Against Hate Crimes (GYEM), a team of advocacy group experts, is raising awareness about the fact that the Hungarian police is still not taking hate crimes seriously. This is despite the fact that there is a new protocol in place to identify and register such acts.

Összefoglaló

A muszlim- és bevándorlásellenes narrativa továbbra is a FIDESZ nemzeti kormány-politikájának meghatározó eleme: célja fenntartani a félelmet azoktól, akik „meghódítják” Európát. A média túlnyomó része kormánypárti ellenőrzés alatt áll, napirenden tartva a Magyarországot fenyegető „migráns veszélyt”, annak ellenére, hogy a számok egészen mást mutatnak. Az elmúlt években a kormány számtalanszor hangsúlyozta az ország történelsi kereszteny identitását. Orbán Viktor, Magyarország miniszterelnöke gyakran beszél hazai és nemzetközi fórumokon a muszlimok magyar, illetve európai társadalomba integrálásának akadályairól. Orbán mindössze egy nappal azután, hogy Brüsszelben tárgyalt migrációs kérdésekről az Európai Bizottság elnökével, Ursula von der Leyennel, kijelentette, hogy nem támogatja a muszlim-keresztény „párhuzamos társadalmat”. „Nem gondoljuk, hogy a muszlim és kereszteny társsadalom keveréke békés és biztonságos lehet, hogy jó életet biztosíthat az emberek számára”- fogalmazott a magyar miniszterelnök. A bevándorlásellenes kampány, és nyomában a biztonságot fenyegető narrativa fokozatosan terjedt ki a „bevándorló idegen” gondosan megalakított képe mellett az illiberális állam más ellenségeire is. A kormánybarát mediában is megjelenő harc célba vette a civil társadalmat, a független médiát, a független igazságszolgáltatási rendszert, az akadémiai és kulturális intézményeket, valamint az ellenzéki pártokat is. A magyar származású milliárdos filantróp, Soros György által alapított szervezetek, a Nyílt Társadalom Intézet és a Közép-európai Egyetem, melyek korábban a civil társadalom számos szereplőjével együttműködtek, üldöztek lettek és végül távoztak kényszerültek az országból. Habár a gyűlölet-bűncselekmények egy részét bejelentik és gyűjti is, Gyűlölet-bűncselekmények Elleni Munkacsoport (GYEM) szakértői felhívják a figyelmet arra, hogy a rendőrség továbbra sem veszi komolyan a gyűlölet-bűncselekményeket, holott a nem rég elfogadott új protokoll lehetőséget adna ezen cselekmények azonosítására és az ellenük való hatékonyabb fellépésre.

Introduction

Hungary’s Muslim population is extremely small in relation to the constructed threat of Muslim migrants that is central to the FIDESZ government’s political campaign. In 2011, only 5,579 persons who identified as Muslim were recorded in the national census, with the majority being followers of Sunni Islam. In 2020, the Muslim population is estimated to be 50,000, of which only 0.50% of the total population of Hungary.

A slow process is underway in Hungary that aims to strip away the legal protections of registered churches and religious associations. With the passing of the “Law on the Right to Freedom of Conscience and Religion, and on Churches, Religions and Religious Communities,” in July 2011, only 14 of 358 retained their legal recognition. Before their status was officially revoked, the Islamic Church (IE - Iszlám Egyház) was the largest Muslim organization in Hungary. Community Muslim organizations are small in number and include the Hungarian Islamic Community (MIK - Magyar Iszlám Közösség) and the Organization of Muslims in Hungary (MME - Magyarországi Muszlimok Egyháza). Of these, the latter largely represents foreign-born Muslims, while the former is mainly dominated by Hungarian-born converts and is better represented in the media. A leading representative organization for Muslims in Hungary is the Islamic Council of Hungary (MIT - Magyarországi Iszlám Tanács), which is an umbrella organization jointly created by the MIK and the MME in 2011 following the constitutional changes.

Islamophobia continues to be a strong undercurrent in Hungarian political discourse, drawing upon historical and deeply embedded anti-Semitic and anti-Roma sentiments. News outlets have reported over the past five years on how the con-continued demonization of the figure of the migrant is used as the scapegoat for the country’s social and economic conditions.7 Central to pro-government news platforms are illustrations that present racialized photos of the “peril” of non-white men desperately walking Europe’s borders.8 The illegalization of providing information or resources to migrants has driven watchdog organizations such as Migszol Migrant Solidarity Group of Hungary underground, further eroding connections between Muslim grassroots community organizations and the Hungarian civil society framework.9

Figure 1: The above image of migrant men walking the Balkan Route has been used repeatedly by government-supported media to incite fear that men are invading the borders of Hungary. The image was shot in 2015.10

According to a Muslim community leader who would speak to us only anonymously, most of the Hungarian population is suspicious of Muslims, especially in regions where they are more visible due to their clothing or ritual practices.11 After the recent terror attacks in Europe (Paris, Nice, Dresden, and Vienna), waves of racial hatred targeting Muslims emerged in online spaces, since the pandemic has meant there are less overall incidents reported of intersubjective violence in public places. Without revealing the name of the Imam or his congregation, it was reported to us that the mosque has suffered online attacks as well as minor incidents such as a local man who repeatedly took his dog to urinate on the mosque in the aftermath of the Vienna terror attack.

It is difficult as of yet to calculate the impact of the pandemic on Muslims in Hungary. One informant, a woman and member of a Budapest Muslim community, was cautiously optimistic that incidents of Islamophobia seem less critical over the past year because the global pandemic has drawn people’s attention to a common enemy: a virus. With the increase in people covering their faces and heads since the start of the pandemic, women in hijab are far less visible in public places. The interviewee believed that this temporary relief that Muslim women in particular feel now that they are not the center of attention due to their head covering will subside in the aftermath of the pandemic.12

Physical and Verbal Attacks
Following the terror attack in Vienna on 2nd November 2020, independent-news portal 444.hu and government-affiliated portal Mandiner reported alarmist coverage of the growing “jihadist” problem across Europe. 444.hu praised the two bystanders, Austrians of Turkish descent, who helped women and police to safety, noting that not all Muslims were killers and a few were even heroes. The newspaper Mandiner printed commentary by political scientist, István Pócza, who confirmed a new pattern in international terrorism following the terror attacks in France and in Austria. Implying that Islamist terror cells are now targeting countries in the region, Pócza strongly confirmed the Hungarian government’s position on creating further restrictions that will make so-called illegal immigration impossible and will curb the spread of Islamic radicalism.13

In Heti Világgazdaság, Muslim Imam József Bordás argued openly in May 2019 that the Hungarian government’s anti-Muslim rhetoric will weaken Christian churches in the long run. Accusing the government of using religion for political purposes, Bordás made a historical comparison by pointing out that “Muslims are the new Jews.” Going on to compare the government to the Taliban in Afghanistan, Bordás predicted that the use of Christianity for political reasons will alienate Christians from their faith and ultimately signal future instability for Hungary.14

Interviews with members of Hungarian Muslim communities have repeatedly revealed discrimination cases at job interviews and workplaces. Such incidents continue to be largely unreported and unregistered by the state. In most cases, Muslim employees conceal their religion at their workplace, or alternately, become self-employed. In one interview, a Muslim student was racially targeted and accused of being a “sleeper agent” during a shift at a department store. In another example, an interviewee described a job interview when the director of the company implied that he wanted to hire a Hungarian and instead ended up interviewing an “Ali” (with the implied reference that an “Ali” cannot also be Hungarian). The interviewee did not get the job, and took no further steps against this occurrence of discrimination.15

Education

The new Hungarian National Curriculum was completed and accepted by the government in January 2020. The new curriculum is arguably more insular than the last, and lacks any comprehensive insight on the religion of Islam despite the fact that religious studies are a mandatory part of the primary school curriculum.16

Pork-free meals are not available for Muslim children in public schools, and in some cases, students are not able to bring in alternatives for lunch in the school. Parents can refer to health reasons to avoid pork and receive vegetarian meals but that also requires going through a lengthy and invasive bureaucratic process where parents are required to have a medical note referring to health reasons rather than citing religious considerations for the dietary restrictions.17

Leading Hungarian politicians always refer to the “Hungarian people,” an undefined term, that is not the same as Hungarian citizens. This phenomenon serves as an example in everyday social interactions.18

Islamophobia continues to be linked to the anti-migration narrative of Hungary’s far-right government. Framed within the context of the securitization of migration and the protection of Hungarian citizens, misinformation about the “growing migrant threat” is pervasive in government-affiliated media sources.19 Conspiracy theories linked to migrants and Muslims in Hungary, including the infamous Soros Plan,20 continue to be popular rhetorical devices that are frequently employed in national and local media pro-government sources.

Spreading misinformation about the numbers of so-called illegal migrants apprehended at Hungary’s southern border, a government-affiliated media source alleged that illegal border-crossing attempts had “increased more than fourfold, from some 1,300 and 1,500 to well over 6,500.” In fact, the numbers of asylum claims made in Hungary are dropping substantially. The global SARS-CoV-2 pandemic has provided an excuse for the government of Hungary to further restrict asylum claims made at its borders. On June 17, 2020, the government adopted the “Act LVIII on Transitional Rules and Epidemiological Preparedness Related to the Cessation of the State of Danger.” This law severely limits access to the territory of Hungary, by designating two Hungarian embassies outside the European Union (in Ukraine and Serbia) where asylum seekers have to submit their declaration of intent, in person, to receive permission to travel to Hungary in order to submit the asylum application itself. This legal loophole makes it virtually impossible for refugees to submit asylum claims, and it allows the government to skirt its responsibility as a signatory of the 1951 Geneva Refugee Convention.

As a leading figure in the anti-migration network, PM Orbán has drawn more praise and ire over the past year for his steadfast opposition to helping alleviate the burden of settling refugees in Europe. Pro-government supporter and Hungarian journalist Boris Kálnoky claims, “Orbán has done an intellectual, material service to Europe. He was berated for it, as the devil incarnate. Orbán was right.” In May 2020, the Court of Justice of the European Union ruled that the practice of constructing prison-like “transit zones” is illegal. The Hungarian government has effectively removed itself from the Common European Asylum System by shifting the responsibility of registering asylum claims to Serbia. According to the Helsinki Committee, the rate of admission has declined from roughly 10 people per working day in 2016 to perhaps one person per day in 2018. In 2019, only 22 people received refugee protection in Hungary, a country with a population of over 10 million people.

In early March, PM Orbán blamed a group of Iranian students studying in Hungary for bringing the coronavirus to the country. Authorities accused the Iranian students of breaching the quarantine rules, and consequently expelled them from the country. Government statements repeatedly underlined the students alleged aggressive behavior, while Orbán publicly linked illegal migration to the spread of coronavirus and Iran.27 Represented by a lawyer from the Hungarian Helsinki Committee, one of the Iranian students concluded that the decision was a “politically motivated show trial.”28 The accusations were never proven and the criminal charges were dropped.29

Figure 2: The image is from Our Homeland Party’s (OHP) Twitter feed following the Vienna terror attack. A far-right, anti-migrant party, OHP warns in the tweet that legal and illegal migration should be prevented. The text references László Toroczkai, formerly the VP of Jobbik, who is also the mayor of Asotthalom, a settlement at the Hungarian-Serbian border who’s idea it was to establish the border fence. The text against the green background reads: “We don’t give up on ’48: we will defend our homeland!” in reference to the 1848 revolution and its implications for mobilizing solidarity in the protection of Hungary’s national sovereignty.30

FIDESZ allies within the European Parliament include the French National Rally (RN), Alternative for Germany, Freiheitliche Partei Österreichs (Freedom Party of Austria), and Lega per Salvini Premier (LSP).31 Following the recent terror attacks in Paris, Nice, Dresden, and Vienna by so-called Islamic State sympathizers, European leaders are once again rallying behind the call to root out “political Islam” in Europe.\textsuperscript{32} PM Orbán had previously been in talks with Austria Chancellor, Sebastian Kurz, to continue rejecting “Political Islam” and to help Hungary in its fight to defend Europe from migrants.\textsuperscript{33} A leader in a Budapest Muslim community leader revealed that members fear Hungary will follow Austria’s example and criminalize “Political Islam.”\textsuperscript{34} Such legislation could create the means to indiscriminately persecute Muslims in Hungary.\textsuperscript{35}

One can present Islam and Muslims in [the] media however one wants without any consequences.\textsuperscript{37}

Since 2015, FIDESZ has continued to portray all Muslim migrants as part of the “invasion of Europe.” Dominating the state-run media are anti-migrant and Islamophobic sentiments which have been documented in the following sources; \textit{Origo}, the rebranded Magyar Nemzet (formerly Magyar Idők), Hir Tv, Echo Tv, PestiTv, and 888.hu. These media outlets fuel distrust and hatred by making false claims that Muslims in Hungary are conspiring to flood the country with Muslim migrants, drawing attention once to the securitization of Hungary. For example, Figure 5 demonstrates how, in response to the Vienna terror incident, the public response in the right-wing media is threats and abuse against Muslims who are speaking out against the attack. In this case, Hungarian Islamic Community, Zoltán Bolek, is told that Islam should be banned, that Bolek should disappear, and that he is a “welfare Muslim” in Hungary.

Justice System

Official data and figures on crime in Hungary are reported and collected by the Unified System of Criminal Statistics of the Investigative Authorities and of Public Prosecution. The majority of Islamophobic, xenophobic, and racially-motivated attacks either remain unreported or uninvestigated as hate crimes. The Hungarian Working Group Against Hate Crimes (GYEM), a team of advocacy group experts, raises awareness of the fact that the Hungarian police is still not taking hate crimes seriously, although the National Chief of Police adopted a new protocol that is mandatory for the entire police forces, which came into effect in July 2019. András László Pap, an expert member of the GYEM, adds that amidst the dramatically shrinking space for cooperation between NGOs, expert organizations, and public authorities, the collaboration between the GYEM and the police is a constructive example and an important stage towards the recognition and adequate state response to hate crime.

Muslim prison inmates report insufficient detention conditions, as institutions fail to provide pork-free meals. The prison jargon calls this type of meals “moha” referring to Mohammad. The interviewee commented that this expression is similarly degrading to “negro” in reference to African Americans. Others reported not being able to practice their religion, unless they bring a certificate verifying that they belong to a Muslim denomination. To obtain such certificates is quite difficult because of the bureaucratic structures in place.

In 2020, a large number of laws were passed related to national security, including amendments to the Fundamental Law. The government used the COVID-19 pandemic in the spring of 2020 to gain sweeping powers as part of the state of emergency and passed the Enabling Act, a ruling by decree that reduces the limitations on the duration of the term or parliamentary oversight for the party in power. Freedom House and others have warned that these changes to the Fundamental Law, that Hungary can no longer be considered a democracy. Changes to the Fundamental Law on 10 November 2020 (the ninth series of changes to be made since 2011) ensures that a Hungarian child is brought up based on national self-identification and a commitment to Christianity.

The Equal Treatment Authority, a body previously tasked with ensuring equal treatment in the workplace and in public life, has been abolished, thus depriving vulnerable groups and individuals whose rights were violated from seeking legal remedy. The Commissioner for Fundamental Rights took over the Equal Treatment Authority’s duties. Human rights and advocacy NGOs expressed their concerns as the Commissioner for Fundamental Rights has a track record of being loyal to the government.

Internet

Attempts to curb the spread of hate speech and misinformation across social media platforms like Facebook and Twitter since 2018 have been largely unsuccessful in Hungary as organizations quickly rebrand in order to continue their online activities. Examples of social media sites, including Facebook, that circulate this kind of virulent hate online are Dzsihádfgyelő, Patrióta, Vadhajtásk and Migrációkutató Intézet. Other websites include dzsihadfigyelo.com, vadhajtakos.hu (commonly known as the “wildest right portal”), generacio.eu, and breitportal.hu - the last two are linked to the group Generation Identity. As Figures 6 and 7 below indicate, Islamophobia is so common and widespread, that abusive and hateful comments can be found virtually anywhere linked to contents about Muslims or Islam.

Figure 6: A post in a Hungarian Facebook expat group (Austria) after the Vienna terror attack on 2 November 2020. The post uses derogatory and abusive language in reference to migrants and “multicultural” Vienna, and it also illustrates how Muslim migrants are seen as both less than human and also a drain on the state’s resources.

Incze Nikoletta, director of the Center for the Study of Political Islam (Politikai Iszlámtanulmányok Központja) is a well-known figure spreading Islamophobic ideas online and in public for a in Hungary.54

The pro-government media, including Origo, the rebranded Magyar Nemzet (formerly known as Magyar Idők), Hír TV, Echo TV, PestiTV, and 888.hu often feature “security experts” whose task is to underline the governing party’s propaganda on security threats related to migration and Islam. These “experts” lack relevant professional background. Far-right organizations, such as the Sixty-Four Counties Youth Movement, the Army of Outlaws, Hungarian Legion, or the Hungarian Self-Defense Movement all share similar views on how Islam is culturally (and in other ways) incompatible with the Hungarian national identity.55

There is a range of sources online that openly promote a targeted hatred of Muslims. Dzsihádfügyélő has developed what it claims to be a “jihad watcher,” and frequently cites Geert Wilders and other right-wing politicians who speak out about Muslim migration to Europe. Taking concepts from Islamic history, the site manufactures false claims that migration is part of jihad in Islamic doctrine through a process of forced migration (incorrectly referencing the historic migration known as the hijra).56 Kuruc.info is another site that incites hatred on the basis of religious and/or perceived racial difference. Targeting in particular Jews and Roma, the site is a hotbed of misinformation and even calls for a “Jewish confrontation.”57

The government continues to hold a two-third majority in parliament, which makes the opposition forces weak in terms of their ability to object and prevent government policies or legislative processes that impact vulnerable groups in Hungary. The shrinking media landscape does not allow opinions to reach wider audiences, and in most cases national coverage is not translated widely outside of Hungary. As British member of the European Parliament (Green Party) Magid Magid declared publicly in January 2020, it is time to address Europe’s Islamophobia problem which is perpetuated by a “poorly regulated media and sustained by agenda-driven think-tanks and self-professed ‘experts’ who brazenly deny the existence of anti-Muslim bigotry.” Magid makes clear the manifestation of Islamophobia in its most explicit form as an existential threat to all who suffer in its shadow. As a Muslim politician in the UK, Magid argues that the hopes of a brighter future for the millions of Muslim EU citizens seem far off.58

Main NGOs Combatting Islamophobia

Confronting Islamophobic, xenophobia, and racist stereotypes remains an uphill struggle for the relatively small number of NGOs and grassroots initiatives who work tirelessly to counter government propaganda.59

The Hungarian Islam Advocacy Association in Hungary (Magyar Iszlámi Jogvédő Egyesület - MIJE) remains the only Hungarian NGO for Muslim rights in Hungary. MIJE has been active since its foundation in 2016. Its main activity focuses on Islamophobic media appearances, offering legal aid to victims of hate crimes and discrimination, and counteracting anti-Muslim government propaganda. Balázs Bakó, leader of the organization, mentions that expanding the membership of the organization is difficult as people often prefer to help anonymously instead of officially joining the organization due to their fear of becoming a target of Islamophobia. The organization cooperates with Hungarian and international NGOs and organizations, and lately appears on the international platform with a focus on countering Islamophobia.

The Subjective Values Foundation focuses on promoting inclusion and social cohesion by implementing projects emphasizing cultural diversity. They focus on informal education and address conflicts arising from social inequalities. Their mission includes creating a sustainable society.

The Menedék Association for Migrants continues to hold workshops in local schools that attempt to educate people about strong prejudices towards Muslim-majority countries fueled massively by government propaganda.

The Hungarian Helsinki Committee (HHC) is a human rights NGO protecting human dignity through legal and public activities. The organization supports refugees, detainees, and victims of law enforcement violence. Besides holding a series of talks to present information based on cases they are working on, in 2018-19, the HHC launched the project “Right to Faith: Protecting the Right to Freedom of Religion in Hungary” with the support of the Embassy of the Netherlands in Budapest.60

Amnesty International Hungary is part of the Amnesty International movement. Its activities include participation in joint international campaigns led by the movement’s members and local campaigns focusing on specifically Hungarian human rights violations and matters.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

In Hungary, the governing party has continuously instrumentalized parliamentary legislation to promote its ideology and political agenda. By observing democratic backsliding since FIDESZ gained power in 2010, the authors of this report are concerned that the dismantled system of checks and balances leaves both domestic and international institutions essentially unable to either influence the Hungarian government or hold it accountable for its actions.

FIDESZ’s recent battle (joining forces with Poland) against the European Union over the Multiannual Financial Framework and the COVID-19 pandemic recovery package underlined again that the governing party continues to avoid any scrutiny on the rule of law in Hungary. Eventually, Hungary and Poland dropped the veto threat, and an agreement was reached, stating that the rule of law clause will only apply if a member state’s action harms the financial interests of the European Union.

In this report, we have written extensively about human rights violations, attacks against democratic institutions, against the media, the opposition, vulnerable groups, civil society, minorities, and vulnerable groups. This continuous assault on democracy in Hungary by its own governing party gives no cause for optimism. However, we consider that looking for solutions that will at least partially solve these problems remains critical. Thus, we underline the importance of considering the recommendations from the previous years’ reports, and focusing on stopping growing xenophobia and intolerance against minorities, people of color, and the small community of Muslims and migrant individuals. Our recommendations include, • Strengthening independent media and cooperation between human rights advocates, NGOs, and expert groups who will work with public offices and authorities to help defend democracy in Hungary.

• Restoring the independence of the judiciary system.
• Restoring freedom of education and addressing the tackling misinformation and bias towards combating fake news.
• Restoring freedom of expression since it has been severely damaged by the government’s interference in many cultural institutions.
• Stronger control of the EU’s post-accession conditions on member state compliance with common values and the rule of law.

Executive Summary
The “Islamophobia in Ireland: National Report 2020” presents worrying reading. Drawing on data provided by the Irish Network Against Racism among others, experiences of anti-Muslim hostility and discrimination by Muslim men, women, and children are recalled with depressing clarity. In the political domain, the far right in Ireland grow apace with up to thirty candidates espousing such platforms in the general election held in early 2020. As further detailed below, the far right in Ireland are clearly connected to their counterparts in the broader international contexts. Activity at an Eid al-Adha celebration in Dublin demonstrates that these groups are not only present online. In the Irish media, evidence of problematic co-location of terms such as ‘Islamic’ and ‘terrorist’ maintain as in previous years. Other reporting practices that can serve to stigmatise Muslim communities are also in evidence wherein a linear logic of converting to Islam is presented as a first step on the road to supporting terrorism. In the online space, evidence presented below further demonstrates the toxicity of social media for Muslims with personal attacks towards a newly appointed mayor in Limerick attracting attention on various platforms. At a number of points in this report, initiatives/good practices in the face of Islamophobia are presented. However, much is left to be done to address Islamophobia in Ireland and this report concludes with recommendations including for the introduction of new hate crime legislation and revised hate speech legislation; improved recording and reporting of Islamophobia by the state; and the development of initiatives at the level of the state and civil society, including the latter holding the former to account, to challenge the growth of the far right.

Statistics on Islamophobia: The Irish Central Statistics Office does not currently publish recorded crime data due to reliability issues. For 2019, INAR data indicate that “Muslims experienced 14 per cent of reported crime cases, and 14 per cent of discrimination cases” and that Muslims were targeted in hate speech on 45 reported occasions. (Data from iReport.ie: Reports of Racism in Ireland 2019). Although relating to 2019, in November 2020, otherwise unavailable official data were released by Irish authorities via the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe's Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights ‘Hate Crime Reporting Database.’ These official data indicate that there were 9 reports of crimes with a ‘Bias against Muslims’ (type of crime is not reported) (15 hate crimes against Muslims were reported to authorities for 2018). (OSCE Hate Crime Reporting Database). In the same database, third-party data for the same period stood at 23 anti-Muslim crimes, including 14 violent attacks, 6 attacks against property and 3 threats.
Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: The official Irish Central Statistics Office does not currently publish recorded crime motivated by discrimination due to reliability issues. (Central Statistics Office). The Irish Network Against Racism published data for 2019 in May of 2020. These included 112 criminal offences; 111 reports of discrimination; 130 other recordable racist incidents; and 174 reports concerning hate speech. In these data, 50 racist assaults were reported (a highest-ever figure for INAR); the figure of 92 represents the highest level of reports of repeat harassment as reported to INAR to date; meanwhile, low levels of reporting of such in-incidents to the police maintain. (Data from iReport.ie: Reports of Racism in Ireland 2019)

Introduction

The “Islamophobia in Ireland: National Report 2020” presents again the realities of anti-Muslim hostility and discrimination in Ireland. As in previous years, the report for 2020 commences with the breakout of anti-Muslim incidents, including attacks on individuals and institutions, online and offline. This is followed by a presentation of insights on the experiences of Muslim youth in the education context before moving to the political and media domains. In the context of politics, the continued rise of the far right in Irish politics is demonstrated below. The Irish media landscape, as in previous years, remains problematic in terms of reportage on Muslim communities/Islam both in mainstream and fringe outlets. From here, the report engages with evidence of online anti-Muslim hostility, before moving to reflect on who the key actors are in propagating Islamophobia in Ireland. The report concludes with recommendations for state and civil society organisations vis-à-vis challenging Islamophobia in Ireland.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

Research published in the summer of 2020 presented some interesting insights on the public perceptions of Muslims and Islam in Ireland. Published by the Irish Human Rights and Equality Commission and the Economic and Social Research Institute, the experimental study focused on “people’s hidden attitudes to minorities in Ireland.” Key findings include that when asked, people were more likely to express more support for Black people to come to Ireland than Muslims; that as a result of “social pressures” people were more inclined to present a more welcoming public front vis-à-vis immigration of Black people over Muslims; that people did not ‘mask’ their negative opinions of the immigration of Muslim people; and that women (40%) are much less in favour of more Muslims coming to Ireland that men (67%).

Given these negative attitudes, it is perhaps no surprise that Muslim men, women, and children in Ireland experience anti-Muslim hostility and discrimination.

In May of 2020, the Irish Network Against Racism (INAR) released data on levels and experiences of racism in Ireland, including those directed towards Muslims. These data revealed experiences of physical assault, threats, harassment, verbal abuse, and discrimination. Unfortunately, there is very little difference for 2020. Data derived from the iReport third-party reporting mechanism provided to the author by the Irish Network Against Racism for 2020 again evidences hostility and discrimination towards Muslims in Ireland.3

In one report to INAR, a witness detailed how they saw:

“An agitated man in his 40s-50s cursed at her and said ‘Irish Only’”

A Muslim man reported how his roommates repeatedly harassed him and repeatedly associated “terrorism, nationality, and Islam.”

Public service institutions in Ireland do not require the removal of religious head coverings for identity photographs.4 Despite this, when accessing public services, a hijab-wearing Muslim woman of European origin reported:

“I went to...the office to apply (social services) card.... [Staff member] said she would take my photo for the card. She said I had to open my head[scarf] for photo. I said no. I can not open my head[scarf]. She said this is rule. I said again I can not open. She went to ask somebody then... she said I do not need to open my headscarf [fully] but I have to [show] my ears.”

The Muslim woman in question was later apologised to in a different branch after taking the issue further.

In an example of serious assault, a male Muslim youth (under 18 years of age) recalled how when walking home he was “attacked by 2 youths, one had a balaclava on.... this isn’t the first time I have been attacked... I have filed numerous reports to the guards (police) and nothing was done.” Interestingly, despite being of Arab background, the assailants in this instance: “screamed... ‘paki you’re dead.’” Research in Ireland evidences the manner in which ‘Paki’ is often directed at Muslims of varying backgrounds as an interchangeable term of abuse.5

The above examples further point up the issue of intersectionality in the experiences of hostility and discrimination lived by Muslims in Ireland, whether based on gender identity and/or the presumption that Muslimness is foreign to Ireland.

In addition to personal experiences of anti-Muslim hostility and discrimination, reports to INAR also made reference to social and mainstream media posts, which will be discussed further below. Reports also provided evidence of anti-Muslim graffiti in public places as Figures 1 and 2 demonstrate.

3. The author would like to thank Shane O’Curry, Director of the Irish Network Against Racism, and Dr Lucy Michael from Lucy Michael Research for providing access to the iReport data for 2020.
4. Religious head coverings are permitted for passport photographs in Ireland once facial features can be seen - https://www.dfa.ie/passportonline/passportonlinephotofaq/. Information on photo requirements for Public Services Cards was not publicly available at the time of writing.
In February, in a high-profile case of anti-Muslim discrimination, Ryanair Chief Executive Michael O’Leary was heavily criticised for suggesting that Muslim men in particular should be the focus of security checks at airports as terrorists “will generally be males of a Muslim persuasion.” O’Leary later apologised for his comments which he claimed were taken out of context and/or misquoted in the media.

In an interview on the topic of increasing racism in Ireland with the newspaper Irish Sun in March, Irish Muslim Lorraine O’Connor from the Muslim Sisters of Éire, recalled her experiences of anti-Muslim racism, noting on how she was “in the bank one day with a Muslim friend and we were egged. I heard them shouting ‘Go back to your own fg country you P*s.’” As above, despite her white Irishness, Lorraine was classed as a foreigner on the basis of her religious dress.

In August, Niall McConnell, leader of the far-right group Stíol na hÉireann, discussed further below, harassed Catholic parish priest Stephen Farragher of St. Patrick’s Church in Ballyhaunis, County Mayo, accusing him of ‘heresy’ because he invited two Muslim men to participate in the final blessing at a mass in his church. In video footage of the incident shared on social media, McConnell refers to Muslims as “foreign, satanic cultists.” Remaining in Ballyhaunis, McConnell and his far-right group targeted a mosque in October in a banner protest against Sharia law (Figs. 3 and 4); local butchers were also targeted on the day regarding the sale of halal meat products.

Education

In July 2020, the Ombudsman for Children published the report “Direct Provision: Children’s Views and Experiences of Living in Direct Provision”. People living in Direct Provision (DP) are in the process of seeking asylum. While not focusing solely on education, the report highlighted the experiences and fears of schoolgoing Mus-

Islamic children from DP. One child quoted in the study recalled strategies to avoid anti-Muslim racism by responding to questions from peers.

“Are you Muslim?”, and I go, “No, I’m not Muslim”, just to like avoid them saying those things. “Oh, you have a gun at your home” or “You’re a terrorist”, or this, this, this.”

Similarly, the report’s authors also note how “some girls were afraid to wear traditional dress such as the hijab (headscarf) as this exposed them as Muslim and therefore a target for hostility.”

The report quotes a child saying, “[If] you have it in a religious event or anything you would wear it [hijab], and there’s always this fear that they would, you know, just bully us or something…”

While there were some examples of good practice on the part of schools, including the provision of prayer rooms by principals, others “had banned the wearing of the headscarf citing health and safety or a uniform code as the reasoning behind this decision. This led to some girls having to remove their headscarves at the school gates or opting for other schools that allowed it.”

Poignantly, one handwritten contribution to the research by a Muslim child, simply but powerfully stated “not safe for headscarf.”

Politics

Thirty candidates espousing far-right positions ran in the general election in Ireland in early 2020. These candidates ran on anti-immigration platforms and as evidenced below and in previous Islamophobia reports on Ireland, some were clear in their positions towards Muslims/Islam in Ireland. These far-right parties and candidates, including candidates from the National Party, the Irish Freedom Party (which ran candidates in twenty-one different locations), and others performed dismally in the general election albeit to varying degrees. Deputy leader of the National Party, James Reynolds, polled 1.74% of the votes in his constituency; the Irish Freedom Party ran ten candidates with their highest returning representative acquiring only 2.06%. Gemma O’Doherty, founder of the unregistered political party Anti-Corruption Ireland (ACI), ran in what was her third election in as many years and returned 1.97% in her constituency of Fingal. As evidenced in the following posts from social media (Twitter has currently suspended her account), O’Doherty actively occupied an anti-Muslim/Islam position in the run-up to the election.

“For the safety of the Irish people, ACI will close mosques until we know what is being preached in them. Islam promotes child marriage, female genital mutilation, the subjugation of women, rape within marriage, barbaric Halal and Jihad against Christians. #GE2020 #VoteGemma2020”.20

“For more Female Genital Mutilation (5k+ cases here so far), ISIS training camps in our mountains, Imams promoting child marriage, jihadi factories, subjugation of women and barbaric halal, vote Sinn Fein, #FFFG and Marxist Left today #GE2020. To end it, #VoteGemma2020”.21

Similarly, although he did not run in the election himself, footage of Justin Barrett, leader of the National Party, circulated in the run-up to the election wherein he claimed that in fifty years’ time, “Ireland will be nationalist and free, or, under Shariah law.”22 Writing on the National Party website in January 2020, on relations between Iran and the United States of America, Barrett referred to people seeking refuge in Ireland as having an “ongoing commitment to Radical Islamic Jihad” and that Iran demonstrates that “Arabs are not alone in being open to the viral madness of fundamentalist Islam which, wherever it goes and whatever its ethnicitv, befoils the nations infected by it.”23

Although not associated with the figures mentioned thus far, it is worth noting that Verona Murphy, elected as an independent candidate in Wexford, has in the past made comments regarding people seeking asylum in Ireland, suggesting that they have been “infiltrated by ISIS” in the run-up to an unsuccessful byelection attempt in 2019.24

According to Europol’s (2020) European Union Terrorism Situation and Trend Report, “known criminal elements have been identified as affiliated with right-wing protests” in Ireland.25 Furthermore, “several high profile right-wing extremist online figures [in Ireland] ask for online donations, partially in cryptocurrencies.”26 Referring to far-right activities in Ireland, Europol states these include “incidents associated with anti-immigrant ideology, including arson attacks on immigrant housing failities and a vehicle... in 2019. There is a growing anti-immigrant movement consistent with right-wing ideology.”

In terms of growing their base, media reports indicate that far-right groups in Ireland such as the National Party, the Irish Freedom Party, and others such as the “avowedly apolitical” Yellow Vest Movement, which has links to the Irish Freedom Party, have utilised the COVID-19 pandemic as a recruitment platform drawing on conspiracy theories, and anti-mask and anti-lockdown positions. One of the protests against pandemic restrictions included a colour party from the “tiny ultra-Catholic faction... Síol na hÉireann,” led by Niall McConnell. McConnell has previously spoken at an EU Parliament event wherein he asserted that “jihadi Islamists” were being brought to Europe by the “Zionist elite.” McConnell ran as a candidate in the general election earlier in the year, returning only five-hundred votes. Interestingly, in the context of the Irish far right, McConnell has connections to “Scottish loyalist” Jim Dowson, a founding member of extreme far-right UK group, Britain First, while Dowson himself has ties with former leader of the British National Party leader Nick Griffin. As noted in previous Islamophobia reports on Ireland, these relationships underscore that the Irish far right have connections to some of their European counterparts - this is further explored in the section on internet activity below. This point is reiterated by Europol in their report wherein it states, “Ireland reported a strong international network involving right-wing extremists from Ireland, other European countries and the USA.” Notably though, only five arrests were made in 2019 relating to terrorism and all these were related to “jihadi terrorism” - there were no arrests for the remaining categories of terrorist activity.

In July 2020, approximately two-hundred Muslims celebrated Eid al-Adha in the iconic setting of Croke Park, the stadium of the national Gaelic Athletic Association (GAA). The Qur’an was recited and speakers representing the state and Muslim communities spoke at what was widely received as a positive event for Ireland. Predictably, the event was also the target for far-right groups. Niall McConnell’s group Síol na hÉireann ran a petition to stop the event going ahead. The petition was titled “Help Stop the Islamisation of Ireland” and was signed online 23,515 times. McConnell, and up to sixty others, including QAnon followers and Gemma O’Doherty also protested outside the Eid event. The latter reportedly claimed that holding the event in Croke Park was an example of “creeping Sharia.” The Catholic Archbishop for Dublin Diarmuid Martin had his car attacked outside Croke Park on the day of the Eid celebrations by people he referred to as “very aggressive”, noting that he could hear Catholic hymns being played in the background as the attack occurred and efforts were made to overturn his car. Writing on their website in the days following Eid, in addition to criticising the GAA, a member of the National Party referred to the event as humiliating, to Muslims as an “alien people,” and that Ireland was in the process of being planted with immigrants.

Media

Media reportage relating to Muslim communities in Ireland over the past number of years, as documented in previous Islamophobia reports has evidenced the problematic use of language, for example co-locating Muslim/Islam(ic) with terms such as terrorism, extremism, etc., thus potentially stigmatising an entire faith community, as well as reductive discussions of an alleged ‘clash of civilisations’ in the aftermath of terrorist acts.42 There is evidence that this practice remains in Irish media with publications in the aftermath of the attacks in Paris, Nice, and Vienna referring to “Muslim extremists”;43 of a “clash of two different cultures” in France, thus suggesting that Muslims cannot be Muslim and French;44 referring to the perpetrators of the horrific terrorist attacks as “Muslim attackers”;45 and referring to such acts as “religious terrorism”.46 All of these practices, as noted above, have a potentially stigmatising effect on all members of Muslim communities.

Reports relating to Lisa Smith were, unlike 2019, far less sensationalist but nonetheless there remained some problematic elements to the coverage of Smith’s legal case. Central here was the repeated and arguably unnecessary references to the fact that Smith had converted to Islam. For example, reports referring to Smith included, “The former Irish Defence member – who had left Ireland in recent years and married after she converted to Islam – had been found in a Syrian refugee camp”;47 “The Co Louth mother of one, who left Ireland and married after converting to Islam, was returned here from Turkey...”;48 Smith “had travelled to Syria several ago [sic] after she converted to Islam”.49 The repeated reference to the fact that Smith had converted to Islam and later travelled to Syria could be understood as presenting a cause - converted to Islam - and an effect - travelled to Syria to join the so-called Islamic State. As with the co-location of terms such as ‘Muslim/Islam’ with attackers, this ‘cause and effect’ frame has the potential to characterise and stigmatise people who convert to Islam.

On a more positive note, the mainstream media coverage of the Eid al-Adha celebration held in Croke Park was overwhelmingly positive. Headlines included “Eid al Adha 2020: Irish Muslims make history as Eid celebrations in Croke Park send message of diversity to world; Around 200 members of the Muslim community gathered at the home of Irish sport to celebrate event”50 and “Message of peace’ as Croke Park hosts Eid”\(^{51}\) to mention but two. It is also understood that the broadcast of the entire event on national television was the first of its kind in a society wherein Muslims are in the minority.\(^{52}\) Despite this, there were some outlying detractors. In the days following the announcement that Eid festivities, the fringe online publication The Liberal.ie ran an article headlined “The Alliance of Former Muslims Ireland has hit out at the GAA allowing Croke Park to be used for Eid Al Adha festivities.”\(^{53}\) The following text was in the main body of the article originally published on 15 July.

> While the pitch of Ireland’s largest stadium will soon be saturated in the blood of terrified animals slaughtered with knives and blades without any form of sedation, just a century ago the field of Croke Park was reddened by the blood of Irish civilians gunned down by British forces during the War for Independence.\(^{54}\)

The article was submitted to a ‘fact check’ process by the more mainstream, Journal.ie which debunked the above claims that animals would be slaughtered in Croke Park, classing them as “NONSENSE”.\(^{55}\) On foot of the journal’s fact check exercise, the Liberal.ie, somewhat interestingly, amended its article to state that “no animals to be slaughtered on site” and that “Croke Park will not host a Muslim large blood sacrifice ritual and the pitch of Ireland’s largest stadium will not soon be saturated in the blood of terrified animals.”\(^{56}\)

Remaining on the fringes of media publications, the aforementioned Síol na hÉireann published a sixteen-page ‘newspaper,’ The Irish Patriot, in January 2020, again, in the run-up to the election.\(^{57}\) The publication in question made specific reference to Muslims and other minority communities in the context of an alleged “New Plantation.” It was also replete with anti-abortion, homophobic, and racist statements/arguments. The paper was sold in locations such as local markets as opposed to reputable newsagents. The following images are taken from the discussed copy of the Irish Patriot.\(^{58}\) (Figs. 5-8)

Finally, turning to the topic of sensationalism in mainstream media, in April, Virgin Media One aired the documentary “Ireland’s Jihadis: True Lives.” As noted in the 2018 Islamophobia report on Ireland after it was originally aired, this programme includes interviews with a Muslim woman who claims that she was previously radicalised and also acquainted with individuals involved in terrorism. The documentary feeds narrative discussed in previous Islamophobia reports wherein Ireland is presented as a soft target for terrorism and a base for ‘Islamic extremists.’

Justice System

In June, then Minister for Justice and Equality Charlie Flanagan and colleague David Stanton announced the membership of a new Anti-Racism Committee (ARC). This committee is an independent body established with the aim of drafting a new National Action Plan Against Racism. Chaired by Prof. Caroline Fennell from University College Cork, the committee is comprised of individuals from across academia, civil society, and the private sector. The terms of reference for the ARC include:

- A review of evidence on racism in Ireland;
- To examine international practice in combatting racism;
- To hold stakeholder dialogues to identify the views of wider civil society; members of the public; members of the Oireachtas; the business sector; media and other relevant parties;
- To produce an interim report to government not more than three months after its first meeting identifying priority issues and a programme of work for the committee;
- To provide a draft anti-racism strategy, containing a clear action plan, at the end of one year.

In terms of stakeholder dialogues, it is understood that conversations have taken place with academics on the experiences of Muslim women in Ireland.

In December, the Department of Justice published the “Legislating for Hate Speech and Hate Crime in Ireland: Report on the Public Consultation 2020.” As indicated in the title, the report drew from public consultations with a range of stakeholders in Ireland. Minister for Justice, Helen McEntee, claimed that the consultation process was a “significant step toward new criminal legislation to deal with hate crime and incitement to hatred.” Some of the key conclusions in the report include,

- Current incitement to hatred legislation is unfit for purpose and should be replaced.
- New offences vis-à-vis incitement legislation are required and these should prohibit:
  - “deliberately or recklessly inciting hatred against a person or group of people due to their association with a protected characteristic” which may be based on perception of membership or association;

63. Department of Justice, “Legislating for Hate Speech and Hate Crime in Ireland”.
o “displaying or distributing material inciting hatred” – “there should be no requirement for the material to be threatening, abusive or insulting in itself.”

• In the context of hate crime, new legislation should include specific “aggravated forms of existing criminal offences” (narrowly defined as those most common to experiences of hate crime) with associated provision for enhanced sentencing; in addition to recognising these events as hate crime, the creation of specific offences will also enable the clear recording and tracking of same throughout the criminal justice process.64

As noted above, in the context of the 2020 general election in Ireland, the online space has been utilised to disseminate anti-Muslim positions. Reports in October note that individuals such as Niall McConnell are active online, whether in posting tweets in response to international events such as the re-opening of Hagia Sophia for Islamic prayers, or engaging with other far-right actors in social media discussions.65 (Fig. 12) McConnell has engaged in online discussions with members of various neo-fascist individuals/groups from across Europe including the NDP (Germany); the New Right (Romania); Democracia Nacional (Spain); E. Michael Jones, who has been referred to as an anti-Semitic author; Dan Eriksson (Europa Terra Nostra); Roberto Fiore (Forza Nuova); Nick Griffin (former leader of the British National Party); the aforementioned Jim Dowson, who is referred to as a “central pillar in the Christian militant group Knights Templar International”; and Greek Golden Dawn associate Athanasios Konstantinou.66 As the Tell MAMA report notes, and as referred to above, McConnell has previously shared a platform at an event in the EU Parliament hosted by Konstantinou that included far-right groups, including the Alliance for Peace and Freedom. The latter organisation is led by Nick Griffin and Gonzalo Martin Garcia of Democracia Nacional, amongst others.67

In July, news emerged of the intense personal harassment meted out to and about newly elected Deputy Mayor for Limerick Azad Talukdar online.68 Talukdar, the first Muslim person to be elected as councilor in Limerick, was targeted by far-right groups/individuals that invoked common anti-Muslim tropes.69 (Figs. 9-14) Some of these posts obviously emanate from within the Irish context. However, some also suggest a broader international element may be involved. In the images below references are made to an alleged imposition of ‘Shariah’ law in Ireland in the future and that the election of Talukdar is a step on the way to this end; that unless ‘Patriots’ react, the Ireland of the future will be Islamic in a context of population replacement and the ‘globalist’ agenda.

The aforementioned online outlet, Liberal.ie, posted an article on the election of Talukdar headed “Fianna Fail’s newly appointed Deputy Mayor of Limerick is Bangladeshi Muslim Azad Talukdar”, wherein it made claims that “[f]or his part, the Fianna Fail man is understood will try and help migrants get housed in Ireland’s fourth largest city.” In another article on Talukdar’s election, the Liberal.ie ran a headline that repeated some of the claims made online about the new Deputy Mayor of Limerick: “‘He can’t even speak English properly’, ‘Let him get on with it’ – Mixed reactions to new Deputy Mayor of Limerick Bangladeshi Muslim Azad Talukdar.”

As detailed above, the central figures most active in what could loosely be understood as an Islamophobia network in Ireland during 2020 include Justin Barrett and his National Party, the Irish Freedom Party, Niall McConnell and his group Síol na hÉireann, and Gemma O’Doherty and her group Anti-Corruption Ireland. Peter O’Loughlin and his party, Identity Ireland, who featured in previous Islamophobia reports on Ireland seemingly continue as a group, although parts of their website have not been updated for some time and online activity seems low. Although previously mentioned in Islamophobia reports, it emerged in January that the Identitarian group in Ireland, Generation Identity Great Britain and Ireland, had disbanded.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

In the run-up to the general election in 2020, the Irish Network Against Racism re-launched its Anti-Racism Election Protocol (AREP). Announcing the relaunch, INAR noted “the context of the increase in racist discourse and the rise of xenophobic populism in Ireland…”. On signing the AREP, political parties are committing not to incite hatred, or take a platform on racist grounds, including towards religious communities, during their campaigns. The Immigrant Council of Ireland (ICI) have also engaged in a number of anti-racism campaigns across 2020. In March, ahead of the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, the ICI engaged with a number of community leaders, including Lorraine O’Connor of the Muslim Sisters of Éire to launch their new racism reporting mechanism. In October, the ICI relaunched its partnership with Transport for Ireland to campaign against racism on public transport. Given the COVID-19 context and discussions of Black Lives Matter, a range of webinars on the topic of racism were held across the year, including those that specifically included Muslim voices.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

The following list is non-exhaustive but presents a starting point in terms of recommendations for challenging Islamophobia in Ireland. Some of the points here have been raised in previous Islamophobia reports for Ireland. The fact that they remain here as recommendations underscores the need for state institutions to take Islamophobia seriously.

- The recording of anti-Muslim hostility and discrimination must be improved at the level of official bodies. As the Irish state is not publishing data on Islamophobia, it must be assumed that these are not being collected.
- Trust must be built with Muslim communities by state institutions in order to encourage the reporting of Islamophobia; one way to do this is to take reports of anti-Muslim hostility and discrimination seriously.
- State institutions must take immediate action to address the growing threat from the far right in Ireland.
- Hate crime legislation must be introduced in Ireland and revised hate speech legislation must be enacted as soon as possible; the latter must incorporate online communication.
- Civil society organisations have been at the fore in the challenge of the far right; this should continue while also holding state institutions to account in a formalised manner.

Executive Summary

The year 2020 has been characterised by the Covid-19 pandemic and its impact on social, economic, and political life all over the world. Its concrete consequences led to an objective reduction of crime - including hate crime - because of the imposition of temporary lockdowns and the shift of attention towards issues considered more urgent in this new context. Thus, the lack of official data, detected in the previous report, continues to be a problem in analysing the level of Islamophobia in Italy and in taking measures to counter it.

At the same time, the instrumental use of religious issues is confirmed at the political level. On the one hand, historically far-right parties continued to talk about the necessity to reduce Muslim presence in Italy assuming the country is a victim of Islamic colonisation. On the other hand, parties with different origins seem to use the Muslim presence only on the occasions that allow them to obtain political goals. The employment and educational sectors greatly suffered from the consequences of the health emergency in terms of layoffs and in the interruption of educational programs; there is no available data to explore better these phenomena. At the same time, the lack of striking discriminatory episodes in the health sector - detected in the 2019 report and mainly concerning the wearing of the veil by doctors and nurses - allows us to assume that in emergency conditions people are able to redefine their priorities and distinguish between real problems and false ones. This does not mean that the health emergency solved the problem of integration by promoting a dynamic of solidarity. On the contrary, the general social dynamics force one to take into account the risk of social fragmentation that can be caused by a global emergency like the Covid-19 pandemic with pretexts such as religion or skin colour.
Sintesi

Nonostante questo, l’uso strumentale del tema religioso è confermato sul piano politico: da un lato, partiti storicamente di estrema destra continuano ad argomentare la necessità di ridurre la presenza dei Musulmani in Italia, presentandola come vittima di una colonizzazione Islamica; dall’altro lato, partiti con una diversa matrice sembrano usare il tema della presenza dei Musulmani solo in quelle occasioni che gli consentirebbero di raggiungere determinati obiettivi politici. Occupazione ed educazione sono settori che hanno fortemente subito le conseguenze dell’emergenza sanitaria - in termini di licenziamenti e interruzione dei percorsi scolastici - tanto che non vi sono sufficienti dati che consentano una loro migliore analisi. Allo stesso tempo, la mancanza di eclatanti episodi discriminatori nel settore sanitario - rilevati nel Report 2019 e riguardanti principalmente l’utilizzo del velo da parte di medici e infermieri - consente di ipotizzare che in condizioni di emergenza le persone siano capaci di ridefinire le proprie priorità distinguendo tra problemi reali e non. Questo non significa che l’emergenza sanitaria risolva il problema dell’integrazione promuovendo dinamiche di solidarietà. Al contrario, le attuali dinamiche sociali obbligano a considerare il rischio di frammentazione sociale che potrebbe essere determinato da una emergenza globale come quella che tutto il mondo sta vivendo, al di là di specifici pretesti come la religione o il colore della pelle.

Considerando i recenti sviluppi nella politica interna Italiana, si ritiene di dover precisare che il presente report tiene conto di eventi economici, politici e sociali avvenuti nel corso del 2020.

Limitations to Islamic Practices

– Hijab Ban: No - depends on local decision. Behind the general ban concerning the impossibility to have access in public places with a covered face - introduced with Law n.152, in 1975, during the so-called Years of Lead - the possibility to wear a hijab or a burka in public places depends on local government. The ban introduced in October 2019 in some Italian regions such as Lombardy, Veneto, and Friuli is still valid.
– Halal Slaughter Ban: No
– Minaret Ban: No - depends on local decision.
– Circumcision Ban: No
– Burka Ban: No - depends on local decision (see Hijab Ban).
– Prayer Ban: No - depends on local decision.
Introduction

As was underlined in the European Islamophobia Report 2019, the lack of official data released by governmental institutions and the difficulties in detecting the real number of hate crimes represent the main problems in researching the level of anti-Muslim crimes in Italy. Thus, it is necessary to integrate the available official data with unofficial data released by media and non-governmental organisations.

These technical limits have been exacerbated by two other important issues that have emerged and have international implications. First, the spread of Covid-19, its impact on the social, economic, and political dimensions of life, and the use of the pandemic as a pretext by far-right, neo-Nazi movements to try to destabilize public order.1 Second, George Floyd’s murder and the consequent movement against racism that spread, first, in the United States and later in Europe. Different episodes of “pure” racism committed on the basis of skin colour have been recorded across Italy.2 In light of the above, if the data presented in 2019 underlined the spread of a feeling of fear towards migrants and Muslims in particular, in 2020, attention seems to have been shifted towards other kinds of targets: blacks and foreigners in general are accused of contributing to the spread of Covid-19, and Jewish people are accused of constituting a lobby that influences the management of Covid-19.

In Italy, the actual political context is considerably different from last year. The right-wing Lega Nord party is no longer a member of the government and the migration policy pursued by the new Minister of Interior adopted a different perspective. In particular, public security decrees introduced by the former Minister of Interior Matteo Salvini have been amended with interventions such as an extended prohibition of refoulement, the lifting of penal sanctions on NGOs for their rescue actions, and clearer rules concerning residence permits.3 Political instability is still a characteristic element in the Italian context but the instrumental use of traditional issues, such as the Muslim presence and unemployment, has been replaced by the debate concerning the way in which the government should face the pandemic.

Considering the religious affiliations of foreigners regularly living in Italy, there are not significant differences compared to the previous year despite a trend of changing numbers. In particular, ISMU (Iniziative e Studi sulla Multietnicità) records an increase in the number of foreigners living in Italy confessing the Christian religion, passing from 53.6% in 2019 to 54.1% (2,900,000) on 1 January 2020. This year too, the Christian component is followed by the Muslim one that represents 29.2% (1,574,000), recording a slight decrease compared to 2019. Thus, even if the percentages are almost unchanged, opposite trends have been recorded. Concerning the countries of origin, according to the ISMU report, Muslims living in Italy come mainly from Morocco (449,900), Albania (205,300), Bangladesh (138,800), Pakistan (119,700), and Senegal (108,500).

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

The restrictive measures applied to contain the health emergency included a national lockdown from 11 March to 3 May. One of the main concrete consequences of the obligation to stay at home was the dramatic reduction of the number of crimes. In the period between 1 and 22 March, the Italian Department of Public Security recorded a 64.2% decrease in committed crimes passing from 146,762 in 2019 to 52,596 in 2020, including hate crimes. This can be considered as one of the main reasons why physical and verbal attacks based on religious motivation are recorded just after the end of the lockdown period.

An event with national relevance concerns the release of Silvia Aisha Romano, a young Italian volunteer kidnapped in Kenya and who remained in captivity for 18 months. In May 2020, Romano was freed and returned to Italy. Regarding her conversion to Islam, certain right-wing national newspapers, such as Libero and Il Giornale, wrote “We Freed a Muslim or “Muslim and Happy, Silvia ‘The Ungrateful’”. Moreover, a large number of insults and threats were posted on social networks so that authorities decided to conduct an anti-terror investigation trying to verify the existence of possible links between the posts’ authors and far-right groups.

In August, in the city of Milan, the blogger Francesco Maria Bienati was involved in a fight that took place after he was targeted with insults towards his person and the local Muslim association that he supports. He required medical treatment following the fight.9

In September, Assia Belhadj, an Italian-Algerian Muslim decided to stand in local elections, in Veneto, supporting as a centre-left candidate. After publicly declaring her candidacy a series of hate messages were posted on her Facebook page such as “Go back” or “You have to go away or you will be in trouble”.10

Employment

As was reported in the last European Islamophobia Report regarding 2019, discrimination in the workplace was recorded at the beginning of 2020 and had external religious signs - such as the wearing of the veil - as a pretext and triggering factor. Regarding 2020, there have been no official records of layoffs motivated by prejudice against Muslims.

The health emergency determined by the spread of Covid-19 imposed a dramatic change in the economic context that probably affected this development.

First, the lockdown imposed by the national government obliged the closure of a great number of economic activities and brought about a dramatic loss of revenue. In this context, unemployment increased and finding a job became almost impossible regardless of possible discriminatory practises. The number of people in employment from January to July 2020 dropped by 1,766,653.11

Second, the last report underlined how the healthcare sector employs a large number of foreign workers and, at the same time, witnesses and records a large number of discriminatory instances. There was a 35% increase of such instances between 2016 and 2019.12 Despite this, the health sector manifests a specific characteristic in this new situation: it was not affected by forced closures and due to the sanitary measures that must be adopted for facing Covid-19, wearing a veil has less relevance when wearing a mask became a duty for all citizens.

Education

Education was one of the fields most severely affected by the pandemic considering the closure of schools and universities. Thus, there is no significant data on the actual conditions of Muslim students. One issue that emerged this year, just like in the previous one, concerns school meals. In this sense, the situation largely varies depending on the position assumed by the school director and the local administration: in the Municipality of Valsamoggia, in the Emilia-Romagna region, a halal menu for the school year 2020-2021 - together with other special diets - is directly available on its website; in the city of Lodi, in the Lombardy region, at the beginning of this year, the request for a specific menu was proposed by the local Muslim community for about 200 children and will be discussed for the next year; in February 2020, a member of the Municipality of Rapallo, in the Genova region, announced her intention to introduce ethnic meals in schools - such as couscous and halal meat – which elicited the strong opposition of her Lega Nord party colleagues.

Politics

The current Italian government was formed after the 2019 crisis when the Lega Nord and Fratelli d’Italia withdrew from the government. The pursued migration policy and the new European political conditions led to the definition of a mechanism of managing migration that allows for a quicker resolution of the crisis determined by the arrivals of migrants, and a higher degree of cooperation among European countries concerning their relocation.

In general, it is possible to notice that Islam and the presence of Muslims in Italy is not the focus of actual political debate. Analysing posts published on the Facebook pages of the main political actors and comparing them with the results published of the European Islamophobia Report 2019, it is possible to confirm that the religious issue is a political instrument that today has been substituted by other, more urgent issues such as those linked to Covid-19. For instance, on the official page of Matteo Salvini, often accused of being too flexible and adjusting his opinions to the political goal, it is possible to detect verbal attacks on Muslim or Islam before the start of the pandemic. On 19 January 2020, during an interview for the journal Israel Ha-Yom on the spread of anti-Semitism in Europe, Salvini stated, “In my opinion, it is also due to the increase of Islamic extremism and fanaticism (...) the great presence of immigrants coming from Muslim countries contributes to the spread of anti-Semitism in Italy too”.

As mentioned above, such posts and declarations were published before the spread of the health emergency or, just after the lockdown, responding to a specific case such as that of Silvia Aisha Romano. These cases illustrated, as in the last report, that the differentiation between an “acceptable” Islam and a violent one is still present in the media.

In considering the Muslim issue as one that is used politically, it must be noticed that the first Italian Muslim mayor, Moreno Marsetti, was elected on 21 September 2020 in the northern province of Venice, with the support of the Lega Nord party. Silvio Berlusconi condemned a small fraction of the Muslim world, when he commented on the brutal murder of the French professor Samuel Paty, in Paris. (Fig. 2)
On the contrary, direct and general attacks are largely present in the official page of Giorgia Meloni, the leader of Fratelli d’Italia that has a strong far-right orientation. (Fig. 3)

Figure 3: “The last word of political Islam of UCOII, abetted by our usual left, to favour the Islamisation of Italy is the lie by which in Italy ‘there are no places where Muslims are buried’. And thanks to this unfounded excuse, the left and radical Muslims pretend to create ‘dedicated Islamic cemeteries’. The truth is that nothing and no one forbids a Muslim to be buried in public cemeteries just like any other Christian, Buddhist, Hinduist, or atheist citizen. Unless someone thinks that it is unworthy of a Muslim to be buried next to ‘heretics’ or in a land ‘that has got dirty by infidels’. The only real use of Islamic cemeteries is to conquer the land and space of Europe and to submit it to Islamic law: a planned and well-known project. That tailed by left and Islamist propaganda is a mystification debunked also by those who have buried, without any problem, their Muslim loved ones in the municipal cemeteries of our cities.” Post published by Giorgia Meloni, leader of Fratelli d’Italia, on her Facebook page.21

In general, it is possible to affirm that the Covid-19 emergency led to a change in the priority given to political issues, and that critical positions against Islam and Muslims are still present in the messages spread by the parties with a strong far-right identity. These positions are not just expressed online but through traditional media as well, such as the introduction written by the leader of Fratelli d’Italia for the “First Report on Europe’s Islamization.”

Media

At the beginning of 2020, the “First Report on Europe’s Islamization” was presented by the Farefuturo Foundation. The report, published in September 2019, was introduced with a paragraph written by Giorgia Meloni, leader of Fratelli d’Italia, that centred on the risk of a new type of colonisation that is possible thanks to the Muslim population’s growth and its high birth rate. Adolfo Urso, president of the foundation and a senator, in the introduction expresses the main goal of this new annual report in the following words,

> This report, curated by the Farefuturo Foundation with the contribution of the Ufficio Studi di Fratelli d’Italia, has the objective of detecting, year by year, if, how and in what way a new threat of Islamization of Europe is being realized, with what instruments and objectives and if, at the same time, there are effective public policies of defence and which can be realized in the State, in the European organizations and in the international ones.

A couple of chapters later, Alessandro Meluzzi, a psychologist, psychiatrist, and professor, writes, > Certainly, the risk of an ethnic substitution (where the Islamic couples have five children as a result of polygamy and Italians have one child per couple) makes us reflect more on the future of our Nation, our identity and our way of life. (…) We will not surrender our Italy to either the Nigerian mafia or the muezzins, because we still prefer to hear the bells ringing than to hear them sing from minarets.

Some of the contributors offer analyses that deserve serious attention, such as the contribution of Giuseppe Cerere, a professor of Arabic Language and Literature at the University of Bologna. Nevertheless, the general objective of the publication seems to be to diffuse the idea that Italy is at risk of being “colonized” as a result of its openness to different cultures.

Among the national newspapers, Libero attests to its far-right orientation with articles such as the one published by Fabio Rubini on 13 September 2020, entitled “Silvia Romano Testimonial against Bad White Men” referring to the participation of the Italian volunteer in the European campaign against Islamophobia.

Figure 4: “Silvia Romano Testimonial against Bad White Men. The Milanese aid worker, convert to Islam during her imprisonment in Somalia, becomes the face of the EU campaign on Islamophobia.” Article published by Fabio Rubini in the newspaper Libero. 26

As exhibited in a specific case, the Italian justice system shows a great capability in balancing different claims coming from different groups of the population.

In June 2020, the Administrative Regional Tribunal (TAR) of Tuscany accepted the claim lodged by the local Muslim community to obtain a permit for the construction of a mosque in the city. The project was stopped by the municipality, which preferred the construction of a stadium, led by the Lega Nord. 27 One month later, in July, Municipality itself announced an appeal to the Council of State. 28

Another example demonstrating the way in which the Italian justice system faces different and unexpected issues that arise from the cohabitation of different cultures comes from Milan. On 26 March, the mayor of the city replied positively to the request of the local Muslim community regarding the need for Muslim cemeteries due to the impossibility of repatriating the deceased to their country of origin due to the pandemic.

Internet

The fundamental role of social networks, websites, and blogs - already underlined in the previous report - seems to have become even more central. In a context in which people are obliged to stay at home and working remotely is encouraged (and sometimes compulsory), technological instruments became even more powerful channels of communication.

Regarding 2020, statistics on hate speech online are not available yet. However, it is possible to analyse web reactions on specific events. For example, in the case of Silvia Aisha Romano, data released by Datamediahub shows how the positions expressed about this news story were polarized despite the fact that 33% of positive reactions prevailed over 16% of negative ones. Among these, the post of Vittorio Sgarbi on his Facebook page read,

---

If the mafia and terrorism are similar, and if they represent the war against the State, and if Silvia Romano is radically converted to Islam, she must be arrested (in Italy she is already under house arrest) for external partnership with terrorist association. She either regrets or she is an accomplice of terrorists.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

Similar to the European Islamophobia Report 2019, the data collected does not allow one to claim that an Islamophobia network really exists in Italy. However, certain political actors are engaged in underlining the supposed risk of a new form of colonisation.

Political actors such as Giorgia Meloni and her Fratelli d'Italia party - together with some media representatives such as Libero - are among those who promote the necessity to avoid the increasing presence of Muslims in Italy (and of foreigners in general). In this sense, the Farefuturo Foundation which authored the “First Report on Europe’s Islamization” should be considered in this section. Indeed, in this publication, the foundation promotes Italian culture and places importance on organizing public events and projects to “reaffirm common, classic and Christian roots other than the civil, social and political values of the European Civilization”. Its president Adolfo Urso started his political career at the beginning of the 1980s with the right-wing Italian Social Movement (MSI). Today, he is a senator of the Italian Republic and a member of the party Fratelli d’Italia, whose Study Office contributed to the publication of the report. Thus, Islamophobic positions seem to be driven by fascist-inspired political representatives.

On the other hand, the role of Pope Francis and the representatives of Muslim communities are relevant in trying to promote a positive integration of all society’s components. Moreover, the reduced influence and electoral success of far-right movements such as Forza Nuova should be noted - even if in the new context of Covid-19 one must be careful of the risk of negative extremist tendencies.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The international campaign “Words Are Stones”, promoted by Lunaria (Italy) in collaboration with associations from different countries such as Antigone (Greece),

32. See Farefuturo Fundation website: https://farefuturofondazione.it/la-fondazione/organigramma/
SOS Racism (Spain), Grenzelos (Austria), and ADICE (France), took place between January and February 2020 in order to sensitize the public to a responsible use of words and to avoid the spread of xenophobia, racism, anti-Semitism, and Islamophobia.33

Universities are actors directly involved in awareness initiatives such as the series of meetings organized at the University of Cagliari on “strengthening our networks to counter the media’s impact on social cohesion and Muslim marked culture” with the participation of the association Un Ponte Per.34 Moreover, the University of Trento with the involvement of associations of Italy, France, and United Kingdom promoted the Hatemeter project, a hate speech tool for monitoring, analysing, and tackling anti-Muslim hatred online, that aimed to increase the knowledge about anti-Muslim hate online.35

Apart from specific projects to counter Islamophobia, the Covid-19 emergency led to some relevant initiatives of solidarity toward local communities. Among them, the UCOII (Union of Italian Islamic Communities) collected more than 500,000 euros to donate to hospitals, civil protection, municipality, and volunteer associations,36 and encouraged Muslim communities to donate blood in response to the call fromAVIS (Association of Voluntary Italian Blood Donors).

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

The impact of the Covid-19 pandemic is an important element that must be taken into account when discussing Islamophobia in 2020. In this unexpected context, the attention has shifted on specific kinds of issues such as the organization of the health service, and the economic and social measures that need to be adopted in order to contain both the spread of the virus and its impact. Thus, it is not surprising that the lack of official data and analyses has not been addressed, considering the new challenge facing all countries around the world.

Moreover, the lockdown itself resulted in a dramatic decrease in the crimes committed and it must be considered as a contributing factor to the limited number of recorded hate crimes.

In light of the above, a general reflection can be put forward. As already mentioned, the Covid-19 emergency forces all of us to redefine our priorities. If wearing the veil was the pretext to refuse medical treatment from a Muslim doctor, it is an excuse that cannot be used any longer in the new context in which doctors and nurses must wear full-body protective gear. Paradoxically, wearing a mask can reduce certain discriminatory dynamics. But, the core in this case is to underline how emergency conditions can allow us to overcome issues that evidently are not so relevant.

The analysis of the political dimension and the media confirms the findings of the previous report as far as the instrumental use of the Muslim issue and the necessity to be aware always of the speaker/author’s real goal. Italy can still be considered a country that is open to other cultures. Even if it is necessary to pay attention to every type of extremism, this openness cannot be considered a weakness.

Executive Summary

In 2020, far-right public figures in the West continued to reproduce Islamophobia against Kosovo. Such attacks included the former U.S. president Donald Trump who announced the “economic normalisation agreement” between Serbia and Kosovo by denying Albanian indigenousness in Europe due to their Muslimness. In France, a conservative politician referred to an Orientalist Kosovo metaphor to speak about riots in Dijon, whereas an anti-Albanian racist statement by a far-right politician was revealed in Germany.

Anti-Albanian racism has also been prevalent in Serbia in 2020. In September, the country’s minister of defence Aleksandar Vulin publicly used the Serbian anti-Albanian racist s-word, which fundamentally denies humanity to Albanians by representing them as ‘non-humans’, at least six times. Given the fact that mass graves of victims of the Kosovo War were still being discovered in Serbia in the same year, this racist language is a reminder of how discriminatory language and the genocides in the Balkans in the 1990s are interlinked.

In light of the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic, the diasporic presence of Kosovars has been problematised in many states in Europe, especially during the summer holiday season. A widely watched news programme in Germany used Islamophobic semiotics to blame returning Kosovar travellers for ‘bringing back’ the virus. Similar arguments were used in other European countries with a considerable Kosovo-Albanian population such as Switzerland and Finland.

In Kosovo, it was also noticeable that public figures decidedly spoke out against Islamophobia in the Albanian context. When the construction of a new central mosque in the country’s capital Prishtina was announced, anti-mosque arguments were not only challenged, but it was argued that Islamophobia is an elite project in Kosovo – this was the argument of theologian Mustafë Bajrami on a televised debate. This assumption implies that crucial incongruences exist between the elite’s hegemonic positions regarding Islam and the population’s omnipresent lived practices derived from diverse Islamic traditions.

In conclusion, this year’s report suggests that it is misleading to distinguish between ‘external’ and ‘internal’ Islamophobia in the Kosovo context for Islamophobia cannot simply be divided into subsections; rather, it is expressed differently according to changing circumstances.
Përmbledhje ekzekutive

Në vitin 2020 figura të njohura të së djathtës ekstreme në perëndim kanë vazhuar të riprodhojnë ligjërim islamofob kundër Kosovës. Një sulm i tillë ka ardhur nga ish-presidenti i ShBA-ve Donald Trump, i cili në postimin e tij në profilin zyrtar në Twitter rrëth “marrëveshjes për normalizimin e marrëdhëniet ekonomike” ndërmjet Kosovës dhe Serbisë, ka mohuar ekzistencën autoktöne të shqiptarëve në Evropë për shkak të përkatësisë fetare. Në Francë, një politikan konservator i është referuar një metafore orientaliste në lidhje me Kosovën për të folur rrëth tajërave në qytetin e Dijonit, ndërsa një deklaratë raciste antishqiptare e bërë nga një politikan i së djathtës ekstreme në Gjermani, ka qenë prezente në media edhe gjatë vitit 2020.

Racizmi antishqiptar ka qenë i përhapur edhe në Serbi gjatë këtij viti. Në shtator, ministri serb i mbrojtjes, Aleksandar Vulin e ka përdorur publikisht të paktën gjashtë herë fjalën serbe antishqiptare e cila ua mohon njerzimin shqiptarëve duke i paraqtur si ‘jonjerzorë’. Pasi varre massive me të zhdukurit e luftës në Kosovë janë gjët ur në Serbi gjatë këtij viti, ky përdorim racist i gjuhës tregon ndërlidhjen ndërmjet gjuhës diskriminuese dhe gjenocideve që kanë ndodhur në Ballkan në vitet e 90-ta.

Si rezultat i përhapjes së pandemisë së Koronavirus-it, prezenca diasporike e kosovarëve në shumë shtete evropiane është problematizuar, sidomos gjatë pushimeve verore. Në një emision të lajmeve shumë të shikuar në Gjermani është përdorur një semiotikë islamofobe për të fajësuar kosovarët të cilët kanë ‘transportuar’ virusin në Gjermani pasi janë kthyer nga pushimet. Argumente të ngjashme janë përdorur edhe në shtete tjera evropiane me një populatë shqiptare të konsiderueshme, për shembull Zvicra apo Finlanda.

Në Kosovë, poashtu, është vërejtur që kritika kundër islamofobisë shqiptare është shprehur në ligjerimet publike më zëshëm se sa vitet e kaluara. Në lajmërimin për ndërërimin e Xhamisë Qendrore në Prishtinë, argumentet kundër saj jo vetëm që janë sfiduar, por edhe është argumentuar që islamofobia në Kosovë është projekt i elitave, siç e ka bërë teologu Mustafë Bajrami në një debat televiziv. Kjo ipotezë nënkupton që ekziston një mospërputhje thlhibësore midis qendrimeve hegjemonike të elitës në lidhje me islamin dhe zakonet e praktikuara nga popullatë të cilët rrjedhojnë nga tradita të ndryshme muslímiane.

Për të thënë ndryshe, ky raport argumenton se dallimi nërmjet islamofobisë “së mbrendshme” dhe “së jashtme” nuk është aq i saktë për shkak se islamofobia nuk mund të ndahet në seksione të veçanta. Më e saktë është hipoteza që islamofobia shprehet ndryshe në varësi të rrëthanelve në të cilat vepron.

Introduction

Rooted in Europe’s colonial past, Islamophobia seems to be inescapable when it comes to the power dynamics at play between the Euro-Atlantic hegemony and Kosovo’s political elites. Discussions about a potential accession of this Muslim-majority country1 to the European Union (EU) has often led to a climate where, as Piro Rexhepi puts it, “The nested Orientalist anxieties and Islamophobia of local elites and their EU counterparts cause them to ascertain that when Kosovo joins the EU, its Muslim subjects will be multiculturalized; that is, they must be assimilated to fit a designated identitarian representational mandate compatible with EU multicultural politics.”2

Islamophobia is not only an understudied topic in the Kosovo context.3 It is also a phenomenon rendered unintelligible in a wider geopolitical setting: race – including the racialisation of Islam – tends to be banned from scholarly debates across continental Europe.4 Fatima El-Tayeb describes the EU’s ambivalent relationship with race as follows: “The key problem in addressing and potentially deconstructing Europe’s ideology of racelessness might indeed be that while the implicit though not at all subtle racialization of Europeanness as white and Christian and thus of racialized minorities as non-European seems indisputable, public – and too often academic – discourse nonetheless rejects this observation as meaningless within an intellectual framework shaped by an Enlightenment universalism that for centuries has managed to claim race as irrelevant while simultaneously treating it as all important.”5 These discursive structures have been imported by Kosovo’s political elites in an attempt to convince their Western counterparts of their ‘Europeanness’.6

In the 2018 report, dynamics and characteristics of Albanian Islamophobia within discourses in Kosovo stigmatising both Muslimness in the diaspora and in the Muslim-majority homeland were elaborated.7 The 2019 report pointed to how central figures of the European Islamophobia network like the former German social democrat Thilo Sarrazin, the Austrian Nobel laureate novelist Peter Handke, and the French far-right ‘Islam critic’ Eric Zemmour attacked Kosovo’s statehood. This year’s report will suggest that the distinction between ‘external’ and ‘internal’ Islamophobia in the Kosovo context is misleading for Islamophobia cannot simply be divided into subsections; rather, it is expressed differently according to changing circumstances.

1. Islam in Kosovo should be not conceived as a monolithic block. Whereas the majority of Muslims are Sunnis (see Bashkësia Islame e Kosovës (BIK) Islamic Community of Kosovo), there are also Sufis (see Bashkësia e Tari-kateve të Kosovës [BTK] Union of Kosovo Tarikats).

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

On April 4, 2020, a mosque was burnt in Vërbc, a village about 40 kilometres west of Prishtina, Kosovo’s capital. The roof and the interior of the mosque were heavily damaged, and the case is still under investigation. However, like in the years before, statistics documenting the wider state of Islamophobia have not been collected by any NGO or governmental institution. Whereas the reasons for this lack of data collection are manifold, the failure to acknowledge Islamophobic dynamics within Kosovo’s political and cultural mainstream discourses could be seen as one of its main reasons.

Figure 1: The burnt mosque in the village of Vërbc in Drenas Municipality. The roof and interior were seriously damaged.

Nearly eight years after the foundation stone was laid, the construction of a new mosque called Xhamia Qendrore (Central Mosque) to be built in the city centre of Prishtina started on July 15, 2020.13 (Fig. 2) As far back as 2017, people opposing the building of the mosque committed several Islamophobic crimes including defacing several mosques with anti-Islam graffiti.14

The debate following the announcement of the construction of Prishtina’s new mosque could be characterised as one of the topics that was discussed in the most controversial manner in 2020. Protests expressing discontent with the building of the mosque took place in Prishtina on July 22, which also generated protests in favour of the building.15 Although relatively small in numbers and scope, the anti-mosque protests were disproportionally reported in newspapers16 and television channels.17 The mosque’s location (in the capital’s city centre), the financing of the construction (major funding coming from the Republic of Turkey Directorate for Religious Affairs, Diyanet), and the architectural style (Ottoman) were polemically debated.18 (Fig. 3)

On the one hand, there were Islamophobic outbursts during these discussions. Perhaps one of the most famous outbursts was the op-ed published by Kosovo’s most popular newspaper Gazeta Express: “This religion [Islam] is primitive and is embraced by primitive and lazy peoples in the Near and Middle East. We, the Albanian people, have not benefited in any way from these peoples, really nothing...”

15. While offering a detailed account of the protest day, the article tends implicitly to frame Muslims voicing criticism against the anti-mosque protesters as irrational and extremist – thus perpetuating the Islamophobic conflation of practising Islam with violence: “Kundërshtohet ndërtimi i xhamisë në Prishtinë - detajet se çfarë ndodhi gjatë protestës”, Bota Sot, 22 July 2020, https://www.botasot.info/aktuale-lajme/1339140/kundershtohet-ndertimi-i-xhamise-ne-prishtine-detajet-se-cfare-ndodhi-gjate-protestes/, (Access date: 13 November 2020).

ing good.” Interestingly, the author uses the Quranic and Albanian word “hajr” (“khayr”) for “good” here.

On the other hand, there were also public figures who spoke out against Islamophobia on this occasion. One example is the theologian Mustafë Bajrami referring to “reports on Islamophobia published by the European Union” that argued that Islamophobia is an elite project in Kosovo – small in number, but huge in effect. The assumption here is that incongruences exist between the elite’s hegemonic positions regarding Islam and the population’s diverse lived practices derived from different Islamic traditions.

Employment

The year 2020 offered several insights into how the Kosovo-Albanian diaspora in the West has been facing Islamophobic discrimination at the workplace and in the labour market. Research in different fields suggests structural reasons for this racism.25

As highlighted in the two previous EIR reports, Kosovo’s economy remains barely functional and is characterised by many structural problems like youth unemployment, old-age poverty, and emigration.26 This interlocked set of oppressing dynamics including racist elements, like global Islamophobia and economic elements like neo-colonialism, are better understood with what Cedric Robinson has defined as “racial capitalism” than with classical economic analyses.27 Consequently, a strict nation-state-centred approach cannot grasp the extent of Islamophobia Kosovo-Albanians experience in employment since a crucial part of them work in blue-collar jobs in the West which are always already racialised in the Global North. The outbreak of COVID-19 in 2020 added a new layer to these interlocked forms of oppression.

In the summer months, the spread of COVID-19 was partly blamed on the Albanian diaspora who was accused of bringing the disease to Germany, after spending their holidays in Kosovo. Emblematic of this attitude is a television report by a widely watched German news programme where the Kosovo-Albanian diasporic community of Germany was portrayed with allusions to their complicity in the uncontrolled spread of the virus in Germany. The way Islamophobia has been incorporated in semiotics is unprecedented in this instance. The cover image of the report depicts a scene where three persons in protective masks and clothes use special disinfecting devices to clean the entry of a mosque in Kosovo.31 (Fig. 4) Similar framings could be observed in other European countries with considerable Kosovo-Albanian populations like Switzerland and Finland.32 Furthermore, it could be argued that the way media conflated the spread of the 2020 pandemic with Islamophobic semiotics was a ‘new’ phenomenon on a more structural level in many Western European countries.33

Figure 5: A headline by Swiss tabloid Blick pertaining to a Kosovo-Albanian whose application for Swiss citizenship has been rejected for no apparent reason for at least 4 years. In the title of the article, the man in question is referred to as a "sweatpants-wearing Kosovar" - a term illustrating how the Albanian population isOthered in Switzerland.34

31. Ibid.
After Alternative für Deutschland (AfD) politician Andreas Winhart filed charges against the famous comedian Enissa Amani, police investigation started on June 10, 2020.35 Previously, Amani had countered Winhart’s racist statements including insults toward Black people in Germany portraying them as potential transmitters of illnesses while using the n-word, and insults toward Kosovo-Albanian nursing staff presenting them as untrustworthy and thievish.36 The context of the latter insult is the 2019 economic agreement facilitating the migration of Kosovo-Albanian nurses to Germany in order to overcome Germany’s shortage of care workers – the racialised aspect of this incident has been analysed in last year’s report.37 The politician’s statement could be considered Islamophobic in so far as it was based on the racialisation of migrants coming from Muslim-majority countries. Moreover, tropes like “untrustworthy” and “thievish” have already been present in Karl May’s Orientalist 1892 novel Durch das Land der Skipetaren (Travelling through Albanian Lands) which marks a foundational moment in the normalisation of anti-Albanian stereotypes in German discourses.38 In 2020, similar events also occurred in other European countries with a considerable Albanian presence like Switzerland.39

Education

Aired on November 23, 2020, a morning show interview with Partia Demokratike e Kosovës (PDK) MP Besa Ismaili addressed a range of topics related to education and Islamophobia in Kosovo.40 Here, Ismaili first argued that Islamophobia, especially in the form of the dominant stereotypes against Albanian rural women wearing the hijab, has its roots in Serbia’s decades-long colonising and racist policies against Albanians within the former Yugoslavia. Ismaili suggested that as part of this structural oppression, this attitude has been internalised by the oppressed, in this case the Kosovo-Albanians.
In the interview, Ismaili described the presence of the hijab as something usual and unspectacular in Kosovar society. Referring to her own teaching experience, she explained how limiting a headscarf-wearing woman only to this aspect of her life crucially restricts the academic exchange by preliminarily defining social roles. Therefore, she stated that “the headscarf is an issue that shouldn’t be one in Kosovo”. In the last two years, no incidents involving discrimination against hijab-wearing girls or young women at school were mediatised, but this trope has been already instrumentalised for Islamophobic purposes.41

Furthermore, on the show, Ismaili highlighted an existing double standard. Whereas Islam tends to be scrutinised, the way Christian Orthodoxy is dealt with within the Serbian minority continues to represent a blind spot in Kosovar politics, she explained. Hence, the politician argued in favour of the creation of institutional oversight of religious matters in Kosovo which could include optional religious education in the country’s schools in order to fight existing religious stereotypes. Thus, Besa Ismaili publicly put forward a policy recommendation that has already been suggested in the Kosovo section of the 2018 report.42

In Kosovo, ‘anti-Americanism’ was a word used in many key political debates in 2020.44 It arose in a context of a Kosovar governmental foreign policy trying to safeguard its interests against Serbia in a way that the Trump administration, and especially U.S. special envoy to Kosovo Richard Grenell, had directly advised against.\(^45\) Led by Prime Minister Albin Kurti, this government was dissolved a few weeks later, on March 25, 2020.\(^46\) Certain international commentators alluded to the event as a coup d'état.\(^47\) The inflationary use of ‘anti-Americanism’ in political discourse is conspicuous. On the one hand, it suggests that politicians are aware of how their position as a small and relatively powerless Muslim-majority country can easily be transformed into Islamophobic arguments against them. On the other hand, reproducing Islamophobia in the Kosovo context because of a lack of agency is nothing less than the enhancement of a vicious circle that eventually works against Kosovo’s foreign policy interests by reinforcing Islamophobic stereotypes that are associated with Albanians in Western political discourse.

The “economic normalisation agreement” between Serbia and Kosovo was reached at the White House on September 4, 2020.\(^48\) It was criticised that, hereby, Kosovo served Trump’s election campaign by offering him another ‘win’ for his foreign policy, while it deteriorated Kosovo’s position on the international stage by tacitly agreeing with Serbia’s refusal to acknowledge the independence of the formerly colonised territory.\(^49\) This criticism can also be read as an intervention against Islamophobia in foreign policy, for Serbia’s anti-Kosovo policy is fuelled by anti-Muslim racism and genocide denial as the awarding of the 2019 Nobel Prize in Literature to Austrian novelist Peter Handke brought to the forefront.\(^50\) That the similar experiences of the colonial oppression of Palestinians and Kosovo-Albanians have been ignored in this diplomatic deal is emblematic of Islamophobic discursive dynamics in Western-dominated foreign policy.\(^51\) Instead, it was agreed upon that for Israel to recognise Kosovo, the latter has to open an embassy in Jerusalem, a step that the EU has criticised.\footnote{52}

Former U.S. president Donald Trump announced this diplomatic arrangement as follows on Twitter: “Another great day for peace with Middle East – Muslim-majority Kosovo and Israel have agreed to normalize ties and establish diplomatic relations. Well-done! More Islamic and Arab nations will follow soon!”\footnote{53} (Fig. 7) If one puts this statement in the context of the rising popularity of the far right’s Islamophobic view of Kosovo in European discourse, one could suggest that Trump’s use of racist semantics – denying Albanian indigenousness in Europe due to their Muslimness – is alerting.\footnote{54} Taking into consideration Trump’s political affiliations, which include the global Islamophobia network, reinforces this claim.\footnote{55}

The racist semantics used by Trump are in line with the raising popularity of the far right’s Islamophobic view of Kosovo in European discourses.

Even though widely ignored in the West, anti-Albanian racism in relation to Kosovo and Albania was present in Serbian politics in 2020. Two examples suggest the scope of this phenomenon which has been present in Serbian politics since the end of the 19th century. First, in September, Serbia’s defence minister Aleksandar Vulin publicly used the Serbian anti-Albanian racist s-word, which fundamentally denies humanity to Albanians by representing them as ‘non-humans’, at least six times. Second, in December, a mass grave of victims of the Kosovo War was discovered in Serbia, and more hidden mass graves most likely exist.

Media

In 2020, the rising popularity of far-right discourses in Euro-Atlantic circles continued to impact negatively the way Western media reported on Kosovo. To what extent this can lead to blatant Islamophobia against Kosovo is demonstrated by an article in the Washington Times stating, “Kosovo’s most famous exports are jihadists”. Furthermore, this polemic piece of writing was built around the right-wing extremist ‘Great Replacement’ theory according to which Orthodox Christian Serbs, as ‘real’ Europeans, lost Kosovo to ‘Oriental’ Muslim Albanians after the war ended in 1999.

Interesting dynamics were to be observed in France. On the one hand, the conservative French politician Eric Ciotti described the Dijon riots of June 2020 in a television interview in an Orientalist way: “The streets of Dijon resembled the streets in Kosovo with groups armed with Kalashnikovs.” On the other hand, an academic article addressing the Islamophobic use of Kosovo in contemporary French political discourse was published. While offering a good overview about the operating Islamophobia network in France with regards to their views on Kosovo, this work omits links between anti-Muslim racism in France and in the Balkans.

On January 10, 2020, the outgoing Kosovo prime minister Ramush Haradinaj approved of the payment of 250,000 euros from the state budget to the Global Coalition against Daesh/Isis. As Skender Perteshi, a researcher at the Kosovo Centre for Security Studies, pointed out, it would have been more useful, if the money had been invested in preventing violent extremism in Kosovo. Instead of addressing these matters constructively, there is a tendency to use these debates as foreign policy means to pre-empt the accusation of Islamism from Western politicians by repeating time after time the mantra of being ‘good and European’ Muslims – a phenomenon that has already been analysed in detail.

The appointment of the Minister of Internal Affairs Agim Veliu as “National Coordinator for the Prevention of Violent Extremism and the Fight against Terrorism” on July 14, 2020, follows the same logic. Whereas this regulation can be criticised from many perspectives, it could be highlighted that it is another government decision prioritising the consideration of Islam through the lens of security policy, and hence neglecting that Islam is covered by the democratic principle of freedom of religion.

On December 30, 2020, Kosovar media reported that the Basic Court of Prishtina decided that Indira Mujaj who was fired from her job as police officer in 2015, due to her headscarf, can return to her previous position.68 Hereby, the court issued an important precedent that will be of importance in the ongoing question of whether it is allowed for civil servants to wear the hijab.69 (Fig. 8)

Internet

On October 19, 2020, Kosovo’s ambassador to France Qëndrim Gashi retweeted an article in Le Figaro featuring the Charlie Hebdo Mohammed caricatures.70 The post caused headlines in Kosovo.71 Condemning the terrorist murder of the teacher in France, the Islamic Community of Kosovo (Bashkësia Islame e Kosovës, BIK) criticised Gashi’s behaviour for “contributing to intolerance and hatred based on religion”, while demanding the country’s foreign ministry distance itself from this undiplomatic act.72 (Fig. 9)

In an interview for the Albanian edition of Le Monde diplomatique published in October 2020, the social scientist Besnik Sinani agreed with the BIK statement by arguing that the ambassador’s retweet violated his primary function – to represent his people – by promoting intolerance and prejudice against Muslims, who constitute the majority of his country’s population.73

Furthermore, Sinani pointed to a more dilemmatic phenomenon characterising discursive dynamics pertaining to Islamophobia in this interview. According to Sinani, the online threats of physical violence against Qëndrim Gashi polarise the debate by making it difficult to take a stance where one can be both against the murder of the teacher in France, or the threats against Gashi, and against the hatred spread by the Charlie Hebdo caricatures.

Another event that received barely any media attention in Kosovo was a video containing anti-Albanian racist slurs commonly used by far-right Serbs which was posted by NBA basketball player Luka Doncic on his social media pages. Doncic, a Slovenian national who plays for the Dallas Mavericks, later apologised for sharing the racist content and deleted the post. The fact that it needed the reaction of Albanian social media users, including the renowned online personality Deni Hoxha, to expose this scandal suggests that Euro-Atlantic popular discourses tend to be unable to recognise Islamophobia with regards to anti-Albanian racism. (Fig. 10)

75. In the video shared by Luka Doncic, fans sing the racist song “Kill Albanians” involving the anti-Albanian s-word in Serbian during an NBA basketball game.
Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

As has been argued elsewhere, it is difficult to speak about concrete structures and institutions promoting Islamophobia in political and cultural discourses in Albanian-majority societies. Islamophobia in Kosovo is diffused and has to be contextualised in the current inescapability of Eurocentrism. Explicit Islamophobic statements are often located in political journalistic circles including public figures like Arbana Xharra or Visar Duriqi. The two, for instance, expressed their Islamophobic views in a widely watched television debate about the construction of the new mosque in Prishtina, broadcasted on July 21, 2020.

However, Islamophobia also circulates in Western discourses about Kosovo, especially in far-right political circles. This disconcerting phenomenon was elaborated in last year’s report and includes widely known figures in Europe like the Austrian novelist Peter Handke, German former politician Thilo Sarrazin, and French far-right ‘Islam critic’ Eric Zemmour. This year’s events have shown that prominent figures like former U.S. president Donald Trump, far-right Alternative für Deutschland (AfD) politician Andreas Winhart, and the French conservative politician Eric Ciotti should be included in the global network reproducing Islamophobia while using the example of Kosovo. It should also be noticed that these Islamophobic views on Kosovo are rooted in Serbian nationalism. Since populist far-right parties are still on the rise in Europe, this development is not likely to stop in the next years.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

In contrast to previous years, 2020 saw many initiatives to counter Islamophobia in Kosovo – as several examples have already shown in this report. Magazines devoted to Muslim life in Albanian societies like Observer.al, E-Zani i Naltë, and Muslimania.al were very active in deconstructing Islamophobic prejudices that have been imported from Western discourses into present mainstream Albanian discourses for decades. An interview with researcher Besnik Sinani, published by Observer.al, is particularly worth mentioning for eloquently addressing the links between Islamophobia in the West and Albanian societies – a much-needed intervention because these connections tend to be ignored in mainstream Albanian discourses.

The culture scene witnessed several works addressing the effects of anti-Muslim racism directed against the Albanian diaspora in the West. Directed by Blerta Neziraj and written by Jeton Neziraj, the 2020 theatrical work The Return of Karl May (Entertaining Play for the German People) tackled the Orientalist and Islamophobic depiction of Albanians in German-speaking discourses since the 19th century. (Fig. 11) The rap album Fast Life 2 by Azet and Albi was one of the most important releases in Germany in 2020 and represents a detailed illustration of diasporic Albanian life in German-speaking Europe including the racialisation and criminalisation of Muslim masculinities.\textsuperscript{86} (Fig. 12) Furthermore, the 2020 drama Exil by Visar Morina demonstrated how racism, as experienced by the Albanian diaspora in Germany, is rooted in Islamophobia by illustrating that even the most ‘assimilated’ Albanian is not capable of escaping from the image of being Muslim in the workplace.\textsuperscript{87} (Fig. 13)

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

In 2020, Islamophobia in Kosovo showed two different tendencies. On the one hand, anti-Muslim tropes within mainstream Kosovar discourses were reproduced. Yet, unlike previous years, these tropes were often challenged by public figures. On the other hand, Islamophobic arguments against Kosovo, especially put forward by extreme right-wing circles, are on the rise in Europe and represent a blind spot in the fight against anti-Muslim racism. Given the current political trends in Europe favouring populist right-wing parties, this development is likely to increase in the next years. Therefore, countering this global Islamophobia network, including influential personalities like the Austrian novelist Peter Handke, German former politician Thilo Sarrazin, and French far-right ‘Islam critic’ Eric Zemmour, is of primordial importance. In order to do so, Kosovo government officials should consider collaborating with institutions and NGOs in Europe that are fighting Islamophobia like the European Network against Racism (ENAR).

Executive Summary

As the Muslim population in Lithuania remains small, there is relatively little politicisation at the national level of Muslims and Islam. This could be said about both the communication and programmes of political parties as well as the far-right platforms. Instead, it is anti-immigrant and anti-refugee attitudes that are more often utilised by public and political figures, and most Islamophobic rhetoric emerges within the latter paradigm.

Although it is evident that Islamophobia is highly prevalent in the society, there are few effective measures of addressing anti-Muslimness. Based on the results of a public opinion poll, Muslims are the most negatively viewed religious community, and among the four most stigmatised groups in Lithuania. Moreover, a recent study revealed that hate crime is largely underreported, while Muslims experience discrimination and derogatory comments in a broad range of everyday situations. The official statistics, hence, cannot be relied upon to describe the situation at hand, and a significant gap, both in terms of awareness and trust, exists between the government institutions responsible for monitoring and tackling hate crime and the Muslim communities. While there have been important positive developments in the attempt to address such disconnection at the institutional level, these issues continue to define the situation in 2020, just as they did in the past years.

While widespread, Islamophobia remains largely unaddressed: the law enforcement mechanisms do not effectively tackle anti-Muslim hate crime and discrimination, especially, if they occur online, while due to the lack of attention given to Islamophobia in the media, there is little discussion and therefore visibility of the issue in the public sphere. It could be said that the issue of Islamophobia for the most part remains invisible to the wider society in Lithuania.
Santrauka

Lietuvoje gyvenančių musulmonų yra itin nedaug, todėl nusiteikimas prieš musulmonus ir islāmą šalyje yra gana retai eksploatuojamas tiek politinių partijų komunikacijoje ir programose, tiek ir radikaliasios dešinės judėjimuose. Galima teigti, kad islamofobiski teiginiai dažniausiai pasirodo imigracijos ir pabėgelių klausimų kontekste – šios temos viešojoje erdvėje yra aptariamos dažniau.

Kita vertus, akivaizdu, kad islamofobija yra paplitusi visuomenėje, tačiau pasigędama priemonių, kurios šią problemą efektyviai spręstų. Pagal 2020 m. atliktos visuomenės nuostatų apklausos rezultatus, musulmonai yra labiausiai stigmatizuojama religinė bendruomenė, ir viena iš keturių negatyviausiai vertinamų visuomenės grupių. Be to, neseniai atliktą kokybinę studiją atskleidė, jog apie neapykantos nusikaltimus dažnai nėra pranešama atsakingoms institucijoms, nors musulmonai patiria diskriminaciją ir sulaikia į juos nukreiptų žeminančių komentarų jiaviriose kasdienėse situacijose. Dėl šių priežasčių akivaizdu, kad oficialioji neapykantos nusikaltimų statistika neatkložia problemos masto. Pastebima, jog valstybinių institucijų darbuotojams trūksta suvokimo apie islamofobiją, o musulmonai nepasitikėti šalies teisėsaugos sistema. Nors per pastaruosius metus instituciniam lygmeniui įvyko svarbių pokyčių, kurie galime prisidės prie efektyvesnės kovos prieš islamofobiją ateityje, 2020 m. pasižymėjo islamofobijos latentumu ir pasyvių institucijų atsakų.

Nors akivaizdžiai paplitusi visuomenėje, islamofobija nėra efektyviai adresuojama: teisėsaugos mechanizmai neužtikrina deramo atsako į diskriminaciją ir neapykantos nusikaltimus prieš musulmonus, ypač, jei incidentai vyksta internetinėje erdvėje, o žiniasklaidoje apie priešiškumą, kurį Lietuvoje patiria musulmonų bendruomenė, yra kalbama itin retai. Dėl to islamofobiją Lietuvoje galima laikyti „nepastebima problema“, apie kurią retai išgirsta plačioji visuomenė.

Introduction

Due to the Tatars who are thought to have migrated to the present-day territory of Lithuania in the 14th century, Islam is recognised as one of the country’s nine traditional religions.1 And yet, the Muslim population in Lithuania is not numerous: based on the population census of 2011, only 2,727 persons, or 0.09 per cent of the total population, identify as Sunni Muslims.2 This can be partially explained by the fact that in the period between World War II and the re-established independence in 1990, immigration to the country was largely limited to movement from other parts of the Soviet Union,3 while the Tatar population has remained relatively small.4 Even though immigration after independence has diversified, the independent Republic of Lithuania has not become a major country of destination.

The Lithuanian society, hence, is predominantly homogenous, both in terms of religion and ethnicity. Most residents view themselves as Roman Catholics (77.2 per cent) with the second largest religious group, Orthodox, accounting for only 4.1 per cent of the population. Similarly, 84.2 per cent of the country’s residents identify as ethnic Lithuanians. The second-largest ethnic groups are Poles and Russians who respectively make up 6.6 and 5.8 per cent of the total population.

It is important to note, however, that since the 2011 population census, Lithuania underwent significant socio-demographic changes. Steadily growing for the past few years, in 2019 immigration exceeded emigration for the first time in 28 years.5 By the beginning of 2021, 87,269 people who were born abroad were living in Lithuania, which is more than twice as many as there were in 2014 (35,500).6 While there is no data being collected on what religion the newly arriving migrants profess, the upcoming 2021 population census might reveal a change both in the religious and ethnic composition of the country’s residents.

Despite the number of Muslims in Lithuania being low, they remain the most stigmatised religious group in the country. Based on the results of a representative poll measuring public attitudes towards different social, ethnic, and religious groups carried out in October 2020, 41 per cent of Lithuanian residents would not like to have Muslims as their neighbours, 28 per cent would not like to have them as co-workers, and almost 39 per cent would not like to have Muslim tenants. Only Roma, recently released prisoners, and persons with psychosocial disabilities were viewed more negatively than Muslims. Furthermore, it is quite evident that being a Muslim plays a key role in determining who is welcome in Lithuania, according to the country’s residents: only 34 per cent agreed that Lithuania should accept war refugees that are Muslims, compared to 62 per cent who would agree to accept war refugees that are Christians. Such findings mark no significant change from 2019. Considering the low numbers of Muslims residing in Lithuania and the increase of negative perceptions in response to the so-called refugee crisis in 2015, public perceptions towards Muslims are arguably shaped by external factors such as media representations rather than personal experiences.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

From January to December 2020, a total of 52 criminal offenses were registered on the grounds foreseen under the Chapter XXV of the Criminal Code “Crimes and misdemeanours against a person’s equal rights and freedom of conscience”. Fifty of the cases were on the grounds foreseen under Article 170 “Incitement against Any National, Racial, Ethnic, Religious or Other Group of Persons” and three of these were incitement to hatred based on religion. There was also one registered criminal offense based on Article 171 “Disturbance of Religious Ceremonies or Religious Celebrations”, and none under Article 169 “Discrimination on Grounds of Nationality, Race, Sex, Descent, Religion or Belonging to Other Groups” during the reported period.

Yet, a recently published report commissioned by the Ministry of the Interior confirms that anti-Muslim crimes and discrimination are significantly more widespread and underrepresented in official government statistics. Based on data from focus groups and individual interviews with Muslims and persons of different ethnicity, respondents have reported verbal and physical abuse; discrimination and bullying in public spaces, including detainment facilities and public institutions, shops, restaurants, airports, and workplaces; discriminatory behaviour by strangers in the streets, by family members and relatives (in cases when Muslims had Lithuanian spouses), property-owners, students and sometimes teaching staff both in schools and higher education institutions. The subjects expressed feeling 'observed' and insecure in public spaces, due to the (perceived) visibility of Muslim identity (the latter being associated with identifiable clothing attributes, especially for women), or because of the subjects’ darker skin complexion. The respondents were told to ‘go home’, were called terrorists, and heard derogatory comments about their physical appearance and/or clothing; some, especially men, have experienced physical attacks. Such incidents had significant impact on the subjects’ well-being, personal relationships, and careers; some have reported attempts to become ‘less visible’; many said they do not feel welcome and consider leaving the country as a result.

7. The public opinion poll took place in October 2020 and was participated by a total of 1,029 Lithuanian residents (15 years of age and older) at 118 sampling points. The survey was initiated by the Lithuanian Social Research Centre (Institute for Ethnic Studies). The results are available online, http://www.ces.lt/wp-content/uploads/2010/02/Visuomen%C4%8C%5E%5B-s-nuostatos-apklausos-rezultatai-2020.pdf (Access date: 5 January 2021).

The study also looked into why Muslims and persons of different ethnicity often do not report incidents to the police. While some situations are addressed unofficially (i.e., through a complaint to the employer of the perpetrator), many remain unaddressed as subjects fear revenge from the perpetrators, lack knowledge about the rights and procedures required to report such incidents, or do not trust the law enforcement institutions. Others are hindered by the language barrier. Some subjects thought that reporting might demand too much time and energy, did not see the situation as serious enough, or believed that hate crime would be difficult to prove. While the reported incidents analysed in the study took place before 2020 and were not limited to a single calendar year, this report revealed the latency of anti-Muslim hate crimes that, given the prevailing public attitudes and deep-rooted issues in addressing and preventing hate crime is likely to be relevant for understanding the situation in the foreseeable future.

Based on the study’s findings and on a series of discussions between the police officers, prosecutors, and representatives of vulnerable groups in different regions of Lithuania, a practical guide for law enforcement officials on cooperation with vulnerable communities in addressing hate crimes was released. The guide aims to provide key information on social, ethnic, and religious communities in Lithuania (including Muslims) and map organisations that can be consulted in order to identify and respond better to hate crimes. Furthermore, the Ministry of the Interior commissioned and disseminated recommendations for public servants who might encounter hate crime in their work on how to apply the criminal code on hate crimes and hate speech.\textsuperscript{13} The qualitative study, the practical guidance, and the recommendations were all commissioned by the Ministry of the Interior, as part of the EU-funded project “Strengthening the Response to Hate Crimes and the Language of Hate in Lithuania”.\textsuperscript{14}

The Office of the Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson has received no complaints of employment-related discrimination against Muslims in 2020. In 2019, no such incidents were reported either.\textsuperscript{15}

On the other hand, the recently disseminated qualitative study investigating experiences of hate crime and hate speech by members of vulnerable groups found that, as in many other areas, discrimination against Muslims and ethnic minorities at work is prevalent, but often goes unreported. Discrimination is being displayed both by co-workers and managerial staff, which, in the latter case, make reporting of such incidents even more complicated for the subjects affected as it might compromise their work relations or their job status.\textsuperscript{16} The prevalence of negative attitudes towards Muslims in Lithuania is also reflected in the results of a representative public opinion poll: almost 3 in 10 residents in Lithuania (28 per cent) would not like to have Muslims as their co-workers.\textsuperscript{17}

The Office of the Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson received no complaints on education-related discrimination against Muslims in 2020.\textsuperscript{18} No cases of Islamophobic content in educational materials and curricula were reported by civil society organisations or emerged within the public sphere.

Yet, the qualitative study investigating experiences of hate crimes and hate speech by members of vulnerable groups suggests that education is not free from Islamophobia, and both students and teaching staff might share and act upon discriminatory views towards Muslims. Such manifestations of Islamophobia, however, are difficult to monitor if cases remain underreported.

Politics

In October 2020, parliamentary elections took place in Lithuania. While the Christian identity was central in the communication of some political parties, during the election campaigns Islam was discussed or touched upon rather rarely. Furthermore, none of the far-right parties that have consistently or unambiguously defined Christianity as central to their political identity passed the electoral vote threshold of 5 per cent.

Based on the findings of the political communication monitoring conducted by the initiative Media4change, the party that utilised religion for campaigning most often was the newly founded Christian Union. Established in March 2020, the party declares itself as led by the principles of Christian democracy and Christian social policy. Even though Islam is not mentioned in its manifesto or core political campaign messages, one of the party founders, Egidijus Vareikis, has made Islamophobic statements. Specifically, he claimed that personal freedoms are diminishing in Muslim-majority states, and made generalised statements about Muslims as principally opposing the liberal democratic tradition of the European states. He stated, “In the eyes of Islamic practitioners (perhaps not all, but at least some), liberal public administration sows clutter, reduces discipline and responsibility, and weakens faith and loyalty to one’s tribe and state”.

The National Alliance, another socially conservative right-wing party, established in March 2020, also frames its identity around Christianity. The party aims to ‘strengthen statehood and Christian tradition and morality’. While Muslims or Islam are not mentioned directly, the manifesto conflates Christianity with universal moral norms. The party is closely linked to Pro patria, one of the most influential far-right platforms and movements in Lithuania.

Anti-immigrant views more generally, rather than anti-Muslim discourses specifically, were more prevalent in the political campaigns. The Lithuanian Centre Party, the National Alliance, and the Union of Intergenerational Solidarity-Cohesion have expressed negative views towards immigration and migrants, arguing that they are an economic threat to the Lithuanian society. However, the aforementioned parties did not receive enough votes to enter parliament.

19. Labanauskas, “Hate Crimes: Qualitative Research Report on Vulnerable Communities”.
None of the parties of the newly formed ruling coalition have made Islamophobic statements or remarks in their election campaigns. However, while the two smaller coalition parties, the Liberal Movement of the Republic of Lithuania and especially the Freedom Party, have built their campaigns around the respect for human rights and individual freedoms (including the right to conscience and religion), neither of them addressed the subject of anti-Muslimness in the country extensively. Only one newly elected parliament member (Freedom Party) has briefly touched upon the importance of inclusive discussion and dialogue with Muslims on issues such as Islamophobia.25

Just as Islam is not high on the agendas of political parties, in the media also, Islam and Muslims were rarely mentioned when national or local events were discussed. For the most part, coverage concentrated on events abroad. The overall tendency is that most articles about Muslims are related to violent incidents and terrorism, and hence, while often indirectly, they nevertheless reinforce the association between Muslimness and opposition or even hatred of the liberal democracies of the European states.26

In comparison to previous months, an increase in articles mentioning Muslims or Islam was noticed in October, following the murder of a teacher Samuel Paty and a knife attack in Nice and Macron’s public statements responding to the incidents. While most articles maintained the separation between Islam and religious extremism, the inclusion of Muslims’ perspectives was very rare: in only 14 from the 631 articles containing Islam-related content in October were Muslims given an opportunity to speak for themselves.27 In previous months, Muslims or Islam were mentioned while covering the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict, the persecution of Uighurs in the Xinjiang province of China, the discrimination of Muslims in Myanmar, and politics in the Middle East. On a few occasions, articles aimed to inform the readers about Muslim communities in Lithuania, their initiatives, heritage, and traditions.28

There are no media outlets of significant readership that systematically produce Islamophobic content, yet, incidents when individual journalists working at major media companies have expressed Islamophobic opinions or released negatively biased articles have occurred. Alfa.lt, a well-known news portal in Lithuania, shared an article covering the murder of Samuel Paty on Facebook. While the information in the article itself was largely fact-bound, the social media post accompanying the article was a personal, non-factual statement entailing and normalising prejudice against (Muslim) refugees. “It’s already nothing strange to laugh at the French, Germans or Swedes for opening the borders and accepting refugees, they fooled themselves and refused to see the reality. But it seems that the patience of the French has run out”. Allegedly, the post was initiated by an individual journalist, and was later deleted. Another instance of strongly biased and emotive language appeared in an article authored by a journalist at another news portal of considerable readership, Respublika.lt, which discussed the protests of the movement ‘Stop Islamisation of Norway’ in Oslo.

Justice System

In 2020, two incidents of discrimination in detention facilities on the grounds of religion, belief, convictions, and views were reported by Muslims. In March, a Muslim detainee submitted a complaint against Kaunas Remand Prison for not being allowed to receive a religious item (a piece of jewellery) from his visiting family members. The Seimas Ombudsmen’s Office who examined the case rejected the complaint, stating that due to regulations set in the law, religious items cannot be passed from family members, and that as an alternative solution the detainment facility was working on introducing a similar item in the facility’s shop. Another incident was reported in August 2020 by an incarcerated person who submitted a complaint against Marijampole Correction House and the Prison Department for refusing to offer a non-vegetarian catering option that would be free of pork. An investigation initiated by the Seimas Ombudsmen’s Office concluded that the law was not violated as the institution offers vegetarian food. Yet, the ombudsman stressed that state authorities should take measures to ensure that incarcerated persons are provided with food in full accordance with their religious beliefs. This case illustrates that the current regulations on which decisions of the ombudsman are based are not particularly favourable to the specific needs of detainees who want to observe their religious beliefs and do not fully ensure equal treatment of incarcerated Muslim persons in correctional facilities.

31. Correspondence with a representative of the Office of Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson.
In March 2020, the Prosecutor General’s Office issued methodological recommendations for the peculiarities regarding the conduct, organisation, and management of the pre-trial investigations into hate crimes and hate speech. While a positive development in its own right, the document has included a rather controversial definition of Islamophobia as an “unfounded fear of or prejudice against Islam or people who profess it (Muslims)”\(^{34}\). A representative of an NGO has raised an issue with the term ‘unfounded’, as it implies that Islamophobia can be ‘founded’.\(^{35}\) As a result, the definition is currently under review.

Internet

In terms of the Internet, the situation has not changed much since 2019. Just as in previous years, messages containing Islamophobic claims were found on far-right, socially conservative websites such as Pro Patria and Alkas. For example, Pro Patria translated an article by Athanasius Schneider who criticises the “Document on Human Fraternity for World Peace and Living Together” signed by Sheikh Ahmed el-Tayeb, Grand Imam of Al-Azhar, and Pope Francis, and argues that “the only enduring universal fraternity is the fraternity in Christ.”\(^{36}\)

Just as in previous years, posts in certain Facebook groups such as Pabėgėliams-ne! Demografiniam lietuvių bumui ir šeimos rėmimui -taip! (“No to refugees! Yes to a demographic boom of Lithuanians and family support”) and Lietuva – Šeimininkams (“Lithuania – for the hosts”) contain mainly anti-immigration messages, but also, on occasion, Islamophobic messages. Arguably the worst situation, however, is in the comment section of certain news portals where anonymous comments can be left (i.e., Delfi.lt, Respublika.lt, tv3.lt). Often, the comments contain direct hate speech. For example, one of the many discriminatory comments under the article on a terrorist attack published by Respublika.lt calls Muslims parasites and asks for a vaccine against them: “Lice on a healthy person’s body, they attack us like Colorado beetles attack potatoes. Maybe someone knows a vaccine against them [Muslims]?”.\(^{37}\) There is no effective mechanism in place for monitoring and effectively addressing discriminatory statements made by anonymous commentators, and law enforcement agencies rarely start investigations even if such cases are reported by NGOs or individuals on their own initiative.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

There were no systematic Islamophobic campaigns and/or lobbying for Islamophobic policies, and there do not appear to be specific networks of figures actively stirring up Islamophobia in Lithuania. Due to the limited visibility of Muslims in the country, Islam is not a frequently or strongly politicised subject. It is worth noting, however, that institutional links exist between right-wing figures and organisations that have been associated with Islamophobic and anti-immigrant statements in the past. The movement and website Pro Patria is closely linked to the Christian-centric and anti-immigrant political party National Alliance, as evidenced by some of its leaders joining and campaigning as members of the party in the 2020 parliamentary elections.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

While there are no organisations whose activities solely focused on combatting Islamophobia, two groups of important actors can be distinguished: (i) the ombudsmen’s offices and NGOs working in the areas of human rights, diversity, and migrant integration, and (ii) Muslim communities. The ombudsmen and NGOs act as ‘watchdogs’ and monitor human rights abuses (Lithuanian Centre for Human Rights, the European Foundation of Human Rights, the Human Rights Monitoring Institute, the Equal Opportunities Ombudsperson and the Seimas Ombudsmen’s Office), as well as implement awareness-raising, community-building projects and provide integration services (Artscape, Lithuanian Red Cross Society). Meanwhile, Muslim communities organise initiatives that help spread the message of their communities’ positive contributions to Lithuanian society. For instance, in May 2020, Muslim communities in the capital Vilnius cooked traditional Uzbek dishes for the employees at the National Cancer Institute as a gesture of appreciation for their hard work saving people’s lives.38

While no political initiatives aimed specifically at combatting Islamophobia took place in 2020, a positive development was the establishment of the working group for tackling hate crimes and hate speech under the Ministry of the Interior.39 The group consists of representatives from relevant state institutions and human rights experts and activists. Furthermore, the outcomes of the project “Enhancing Response to Hate Crimes and Hate Speech in Lithuania”, such as the already discussed qualitative study on experiences of hate crimes, a practical guide for law enforcement officials on cooperation with communities of vulnerable groups, and recommendations on the application of the criminal code of tackling hate crime and hate speech are all encouraging steps towards a better mechanism for addressing and preventing hatred. The initiatives, however, signify only the start of addressing the deep-rooted issues of widespread discrimination, negative attitudes, and hate crimes against Muslims and other vulnerable groups in an efficient manner, with a lot more progress needed to be made.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Even though Islam and Muslims are not particularly politicised or extensively discussed topics in the Lithuanian public sphere at the moment, it is evident that Islamophobia is highly prevalent. At the same time, there is a clear disconnection between the everyday discrimination experienced by Muslims and the state institutions that seem to lack awareness of the scale of anti-Muslim racism and that are only now starting to develop mechanisms through which such discrimination could be addressed more efficiently. Perhaps the most worrisome aspect is that there is little public discussion about Islamophobia as such, meaning that anti-Muslimness, even if widespread, remains largely invisible to the wider society.

Recommendations

• Increase visibility of Muslims, their everyday lives, and experiences within the media, and give more attention to the prevalence and problematisation of Islamophobia.
• Promote responsible and ethical media reporting on Muslim-related events.
• Enhance further the capacities of law enforcement officials not only in recognising anti-Muslim hate crimes and discrimination, but also in proactively building trust and reaching out to Muslim communities.
• Ensure the provision of support for persons who have experienced anti-Muslim hate crime, hate speech, or discrimination.
• Continue funding, supporting, and developing initiatives that monitor incidents of discrimination and Islamophobic claims made by politicians, journalists, and other public and non-public figures.
• Enhance the prevention of hate crimes and discrimination and promote better understanding of both Islam and the experiences of Muslims living in Lithuania through awareness-raising campaigns, intercultural competence trainings, and the development of critical literacy skills in all age groups.

Executive Summary

In 2020, Malta was shocked by the COVID-19 pandemic, like many other countries in the World, and this has dominated the events of the year. Therefore, whilst Malta remained on the route of the global circulation of Islamophobic statements and images, the visibility has decreased when compared to other years. The materials presented were often translated from foreign sources and adapted to the local context by ‘patriots’ – or, more correctly, far-right parties.

The ongoing establishment of far-right parties espousing Islamophobic and xenophobic views is on the rise. This was especially evident during the European Parliament elections, where candidates from two different parties ran. The compilation of this report is based on information primarily from the Internet, which includes websites of Islamophobic groups, the media, and also social media. Together with this, studies and reports conducted by European organisations and agencies were also taken into consideration. Some of the publications quoted in the report are from 2019 and others predate this year.

The author also took into account personal encounters with Muslims in Malta, both Maltese Muslims and foreign Muslims, and their experiences and recommendations. In brief, the most prominent points discussed in this report include the initiation of a public consultation for a National Action Plan against Racism and Xenophobia, the murder of Ivorian migrant Lassana Cisse Souleymane, and the COVID-19 immigration situation. Publications and reports in Malta which show statistical data are very sparse. There is little research by Maltese institutions on Islamophobia. There is an evident need for additional research and policies in Malta, especially by government entities. In closed groups, the Muslim community complains about unemployment as a result of the headscarf and other discrimination that the community encounters. On a national level, other than the publications and initiatives carried out by NGOs, the most documented cases of discrimination and Islamophobia are in the FRA Fundamental Rights Report 2020.

Introduction

The recent Eurobarometer on integration in the EU, published in September 2019, shows that many citizens in Malta still have a perception that there are high levels of discrimination on the basis of skin colour, ethnic origin, and religion or belief. Specifically on the integration of migrants, more than half of the participants in the survey responded that immigration from outside the EU is a problem in Malta. As a result, this has an effect on the integration of migrants in society, frequently leading to discrimination in the community.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

There are no official statistics on hate crime published in 2020 or recent years in relation to physical attacks specifically related to Islamophobia which reflect the domestic situation. However, as a reflection of the global anti-racism movement and increased local tensions over immigrations, hate crime reports were doubled in June when compared to those filed the month before (May 2020). Other than the protests organised in Malta in 2020 as part of the global protests with respect to the murder of George Floyd, the most shocking domestic attacks in 2019 was the racially motivated killing of Lassana Cisse Souleymane and the wounding of two other African migrants in Hal Far on 6 April 2019, which is still pending final judgment. A memorial dedicated to Lassana was held in 2020 which was attended by the Junior Minister for Equality and Reforms and NGOs whereby they recalled the horrendous consequences of racism and hate crimes. The NCPE (National Commission for Promotion of Equality) in response to this said that all cases of racism, discrimination, and intolerance are an affront to a democratic society and as such they should be treated with the utmost seriousness. The NCPE envisaged a strengthening of its reach through the establishment of a Human Rights and Equality Commission (HREC). This has created national recognition of the high levels of intolerance, and public figures have been reminding the public that hate has no place in Malta, and that they hope that maximum efforts will be made to combat racism, xenophobia, and discrimination.5

Employment

Discrimination of migrants in places of employment has always been a problem, and studies by the UNHCR have noted this many times in reports. Problems occur in the process of being issued the adequate work permits, in the workplace, and not being offered employment following job interviews.6

A more recent study, compiled with the help of Jobsplus, the Malta Employers Association (MEA), the Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS), and African Media Association Malta (AMAM),7 identified specific challenges employers face, including the cost of work permits. It also encouraged site-specific language courses and cultural training for those who employ refugees, as well as the development of appropriate tools to bridge the gap between refugees and employers. The study also noted that female refugees especially struggled to get jobs.

Whilst the aforementioned report is targeted toward ensuring access to English and Maltese language classes, the report further highlighted the need for sources which would assure that migrants have access to learning their rights and obligations under Maltese law. This would ensure that they are not discriminated, and if they face such discrimination, they are informed of the adequate mechanisms and tools for reporting such discrimination, as well as being aware of their rights. There were also calls to establish a body to assess and recognise the skills of refugees who do not have recognised certificates or refugees who no longer have the certificates in their possession.

The report also revealed that those interviewed as part of the research said they were discriminated against for religious and cultural reasons, often feeling like they were not shortlisted for an interview because of their last name. The employers remarked that they are discouraged from employing refugees due to colleagues not being welcoming or customers submitting complaints. This is not only limited to refugees but, of course, extends to all migrants. In this regard, the UNHCR Malta, when commenting on the work being undertaken by the government in this regard, also urged it, to ensure that public policy and targeted measures support these efforts and the institutionalisation of new measures, as their success will ultimately be in the best interest of everyone.8

Education

As of the September 2018 academic year, Mariam Al Batool School, which offered primary and secondary education for Muslim students, closed its doors for secondary education because of financial difficulties. Imam Mohammed El Sadi, the most known imam in the country and a leader of the Muslim community in Malta, requested that religion lessons on Islam be provided in government schools in the absence of an Islamic school in Malta. To this day, most Muslim students sit for Ethics lessons at the secondary school level instead of Catholicism lessons. However, students in primary school do not have an alternative to the lessons on Catholicism. This also follows a controversy in 2017 regarding religion classes on Islam in public schools.9 Presently, a voluntary programme is being designed to introduce religion teachings on Islam in government schools; however, it is still in its infancy.

There has been no curriculum material reported as Islamophobic in content. Inclusion has been encouraged by educators in the last few years. However, there is a need for educators to be informed about Islam and Muslims, as such information is not provided to them and they struggle to deal with pupils in their classes who practice Islam.

Politics

In the 2019 MEP elections, Norman Lowell’s far-right party emerged as Malta’s strongest third party in the elections with more than 8,000 votes.10 Together with the anti-immigrant Moviment Patrijotti Maltin, far-right voters in Malta stand at 3.5%.11 Unless this is countered by strong political will for integration from the other two parties, the growth of the far right may become a permanent fixture in Maltese politics. This year, the first National Action Plan against Racism and Xenophobia (NAPRAX) was launched for public consultation, whereby the government has sought submissions from the public to address racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia, and intolerance.12

11. Ibid.
Moreover, the Guardian for Future Generations Maurice Mizzi has hit out at irregular immigration in Malta, arguing that Muslims are “taking over” and insisting the country should stop migrants from entering.\textsuperscript{13} The \textit{Times of Malta} noted that “Mr Mizzi’s declaration contradicts the former Prime Minister’s statement about the need for more workers, irrespective of religion, origin or colour.”\textsuperscript{14} Mizzi, who has headed the government-appointed Guardian Commission since it was reconstituted in 2017, unprompted later in the interview returned to the issue, repeating his view that Muslims were taking over by a demographic shift, raising fears of fundamentalist “Sharia Law” punishment, and insisting children born to migrants should not be given Maltese citizenship. NGOs immediately demanded that the commissioner be dismissed. He went on to say,

We should stop these people coming from abroad without a passport, with their children and with a different religion. We are living in a Catholic country, and when I die, I want to die in a Catholic country. At the moment, there are so many Muslims coming – they’re all having nine babies, next to our two – and they will take over eventually.\textsuperscript{15}

He eventually resigned three weeks after his statement. This was also the view shared by the mayor of a locality where numerous people from different nationalities reside. Alfred Grima, the mayor of Saint Paul’s Bay, has stated that if his locality had to serve as a pilot project for integration in Malta, it would result in a failure. He also expressed anti-immigrant sentiments and concluded that integration in Malta has failed.\textsuperscript{16}

\textbf{Media}

Lovin Malta, \textit{MaltaToday}, and \textit{Times of Malta} are amongst the media outlets which encourage inclusion and integration of Muslims in Malta. As a newspaper, \textit{Times of Malta}, has blocked the comments section when reporting on sensitive matters such as immigration and Muslims to avoid racist and Islamophobic comments. Furthermore, the news portal Lovin Malta creates content which challenges in a positive way the perception of Maltese people about Muslims.

On 24 April 2020, Lovin Malta, shared information about the month of Ramadan and wished the Muslim population “Ramadan Mubarak.” This is novel, when it comes to recognizing different religious communities in Malta.\textsuperscript{17}

International human rights monitoring bodies reiterated their concerns about existing gaps in national criminal codes in addressing hate crime and hate speech. The European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) expressed its concerns that the criminal code in Malta does not contain provisions that criminalise “the creation or leadership of a group which promotes racism or support for such a group” and “participation in its activities.” Maltese authorities were urged to add to the criminal code “incitement to discrimination; defamation; public dissemination, public distribution, production or storage, with a racist aim, of written, pictorial or other material”. However, to date, the criminal code has not been amended to include these recommendations, and under Article 82A of the criminal code only incitement to racial hatred is included.

The Internet is the space where Islamophobic comments are most prevalent. Social media pages such as that of the Ghaqda Patrijotti Maltin also known as Moviment Patrijotti, continue to serve as a platform for Islamophobic comments and posters.\(^{23}\) It is very difficult to monitor these platforms and to hold people responsible for their online comments and the fake news which is spread (and is not monitored by any institution). Hate speech is codified under Maltese Criminal Law Article 82A (1) which includes “written or printed material” and on the basis of religion, amongst others. However, case law is sparse on this subject although hate speech is always on the rise. One of the most important campaigns has been the Council of Europe’s “No Hate Speech Movement”. On the website for this campaign the reporting procedures of the respective party countries are included to facilitate reporting.\(^{24}\)

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

As outlined in the section on politics, the primary foundation of the Islamophobia network in Malta is the Ghaqda Patrijotti Maltin movement. Another group is Imperium Europa, which shares the same far-right ideology, and supports fascism and nationalism. However, in the last three to five years, Ghaqda Patrijotti Maltin has taken the lead with its Facebook page and presence on social media. Although, this might not seem like an extensive network, the geographical size of Malta should also be taken into consideration, together with its population. This group has organised protests all across the country. Moreover, Alex Pisani and Henry Battistino, the moderators and leaders of this movement, are responsible for the organisation of such events and sharing material, which is then further circulated and shared.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The most prominent and active groups in Malta which create initiatives and events to combat discrimination, racism, and Islamophobia are the following: People for Change Foundation (PfC), Integra, the National Commission for Promotion of Equality (NCPE), the aditus foundation, and the Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS). The NCPE is the governmental agency for equality; however, it focuses more on gender equality than on interfaith issues. NGOs in Malta focus primarily on racism and discrimination faced by foreigners (immigrants & refugees) rather than by Maltese Muslims.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

As evident from the above research, which includes informal interviews with Muslims, newspaper research, and statistics, Malta is very underdeveloped on this matter and requires research and policies to counter Islamophobia. Muslims in Malta feel the lacuna left by the failure of politicians and equality bodies to address the situation. Nonetheless, NAPRAX provides a promising start for a better focus on this matter. In the current global anti-Muslim climate, the development of mechanisms to counter hate are crucial. Moreover, adequate screening of social media pages, and a safe and user-friendly reporting system are also very important. Creating space for dialogue is essential to countering Islamophobia together with awareness and education about Islam to help civil society identify what is real and what is fake, and to overcome the barriers Muslims face on a daily basis. Moreover, this would also help overcome prejudice and encourage viewing Muslims beyond stereotypes, as individuals.

There is a need to distinguish Islamophobia from other discriminatory ideologies and to map out its seriousness. This will also require an observatory authority that can monitor and record Islamophobic incidents – at the moment, it is very difficult to establish clear figures. A clear policy framework is also important for educators and schools to ensure that there is uniformity and an inclusive environment for students. This can be extended to all areas. Awareness and knowledge of Islam is pivotal for everyone, including journalists, politicians, and civil servants. Further recommendations include:

• Setting up alternative mechanisms to encourage victims to report hate crime and hate speech incidents, such as third-party reporting systems or dedicated telephone lines.
• A mechanism for collecting disaggregated data on hate crime incidents, including hate speech, on the ground of religion.
• Authorities need to press ahead with and intensify training for police, prosecutors, and judges in order to ensure a more effective fight against Islamophobia.
• The adoption of a strategy for the integration of all Muslims in the community as soon as possible, along with a clear message to the public that integration is a two-way process for both Muslims and the majority population.
• Authorities must organise a campaign to raise awareness among the public about Islam and Muslims.
• Policy documents and formal statistics about the Muslim population in Malta, both foreign and Maltese, are necessary.

Executive Summary

In comparison with other ex-Yugoslavian countries, Montenegro follows a progressive EU integration process. Montenegro has introduced many laws that should provide the full extent of social, political, and economic rights to minorities. On the other hand, the country has a fragile economy and poor rule of law followed by a deep political crisis. The crisis deepened after the alleged coup in 2017 due to NATO succession and protests in 2018/19 because of the Law on Religion and Belief. The law was voted at the end of 2019, and protests organized by the Serbian Orthodox Church became bigger and spilled over to neighboring Serbia. In this manner, greater ethnic polarization was incited.

The rule of the Democratic Party of Socialists came to an end after thirty years. Although this party and its leader, Milo Đukanović, can be described as increasingly authoritarian and their corruption is well documented, there was no place for the celebration of their loss because their opponents and soon to be new leadership of Montenegro represents a bigger threat to democracy. The opposition coalition, which won the election, is mainly composed of pro-Serbian (pro-Russian) parties and led electoral campaigns by flaming ethnic nationalist sentiment. Immediately after the results of the election were published and the Serbian community in Montenegro started celebrating, Muslims across the country reported incidents. The highest tensions were in the city of Pljevlja, where the Islamic Community’s local office was attacked and Bosniak residents were verbally and physically assaulted. This city is situated 40km east of the Bosnian border. Pljevlja was almost ethnically cleansed in 1992 when Muslims were persecuted, tortured, and killed. The message left at the Islamic Community’s office stated “Pljevlja will be Srebrenica.” The Srebrenica genocide was the most common reference in other assaults as well sending a clear message to the Muslim community.

The opposition coalition announced they will continue European integration and remain a member of NATO although ethnic and national minorities including Bosniaks and Albanians won’t be part of newly constituted Government, for the first time since 2006.
Izvršni režime

Vladavina Socijalne Demokratske Partije je došla kraju pose trideset godina. Iako vladavina ove partije i njenog lidera Mila Đukanovića može opisati kao autori-tarna sa dokazanim slučajevima visoke korupcije, njihov poraz se nije mogao slaviti jer je pobednik ovih izbora koalicija uglavnom sastavljena od pro Srpskih pro Ruskih partija čije kampanje su stalno podržavale etno nacionalističke narative. Odmah nakon proglašenja pobednika u izbornoj noći, Muslimani širom države su počeli prijavljivati incidente. Najgora situacija bila je u Pljavljima gde su kancelarije Islamske zajednice kamenovane a poruka „Pljevlja će biti Srebrenica“ ostavljena na vraćima. Muslimani u Pljevljima su u naradnim danima bili verbalno i fizički vrijedani i zaplašivani. Pljevlja se nalaze na samo 40km od bosanske granice, grad je 90tih zamalo etnički očišćen jer su Muslimani bili gonjeni, mučeni i ubijani. Incidenti su prijavljeni i iz ostalih gradova a genocid U Srebrenici je bila glavna referenca svih incidenta, što je bila jasna poruka za Muslimane Crne Gore.

Opozicija je najavila da će Crna Gora ostati na evropskom putu i članica NATO-a, osnivanje Vlade se još uvijek čeka lijepoširno da etničke i nacionalne manjine neće biti deo vladajuće većine.
Country Profile
EIR 2020

Country: Montenegro
Type of Regime: Democratic Republic
Form of Government: Parliamentary Republic
Ruling Parties: Alliance: Zdravko Krivokapić-For the Future of Montenegro, Aleksa Bečić-Peace is Our Nation, and Dritan Abazović- Black on White.
Opposition Parties: Democratic Party of Socialists (DPS)

Last Elections: Parliamentary elections in 2020 ended the near 30-year-rule of Milo Đukanović’s Democratic Party of Socialists (DPS); they won 40 out of 81 seats. The opposition won a wafer-thin majority with 50.7% of the votes or 41 out of 81 seats in the Montenegrin parliament. The opposition consists of three blocs or alliances: For the Future of Montenegro, Peace is Our Nation, and Black on White.

Total Population: 629,364 (based on the latest estimates by the United Nations, 2019)

Major Languages: Montenegrin (national and official), Serbian, Bosnian, Albanian, Croatian (in official use)

Official Religion: No official religion

Statistics on Islamophobia: Montenegro has reported information on hate crimes to the ODIHR, counting 31 hate crimes but the data for 2020 is not published yet. Besides the numbers, no additional information is available. Montenegro’s Criminal Code contains a general penalty enhancement and a substantive offense provision. Hate crime data is collected by the Montenegrin Prosecutor’s Office and the Supreme Court. Data on hate crime is not publicly available. There are no statistics on Islamophobia available.

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: In 2020, the Ombudsman received 53 complaints in regard to racial, national, ethnic and religious discrimination. Ombudsman’s Annual report for 2020 concludes that there is strong discrimination of all minorities in the job market especially Roma people. The report also states that negative sentiment and ethnic distance towards Muslims has been visibly increased.

Major Religions (% of Population): Orthodox Christianity (72%), Islam (15.97%), Catholic Christianity (3.43%)

Muslim Population (% of Population): According to the Census of Population, Households and Dwellings in Montenegro 2011, Montenegro’s 118,477 Muslims make up 19.11% of the total population.

Main Muslim Community Organizations: Islamic Community, Bosniak Forum
Main NGOs Combating Islamophobia: The Islamic Community is the most important institution for the Muslim community and its most relevant representative; however, it doesn’t monitor or collect any data on anti-Muslim hate crimes or speech. Moreover, it does not have any initiatives or projects dealing with Islamophobia specifically. It is important to add that the Islamic Community has the unique status of a religious institution; in other words, it doesn’t belong to the NGO or state sector. The Ministry of Human and Minority Rights, a state institution, deals with human rights in general. It collaborates with the Islamic Community and other minority representatives successfully, and has initiated many policies and initiatives that were beneficial for the Muslim community. However, so far it has not recognized Islamophobia as a problem that should be addressed. The same goes for local or international NGOs present in Montenegro.

Far-Right Parties: The Democratic Front is a coalition of several right-wing parties that at the moment form the opposition. Although they describe themselves as a center-right coalition, their narrative promotes Serbian nationalistic ideology, and they openly support The Hague-convicted war criminals like Radovan Karadžić. They have the full support of the Serbian Orthodox Church in Montenegro and Serbia as well as the support of far-right parties from Serbia.

Far-Right Movements: Ravnogorski pokret (Ravnogorski or Ravna Gora movement, also known as Chetniks) which is outlawed by the state.

Far-Right Militant Organizations: N/A

Introduction

When speaking about Islamophobia within ex-Yugoslavian countries one must underline the strong presence of intersectionality among national, ethnic, and religious identity. Muslims from these countries belong to various ethnic and national communities. Discrimination is therefore sometimes biased to their religious identity and sometimes to their national/ethnic identity. This explains why in the context of Islamophobia some minorities are more discriminated and more targeted than others. Speaking specifically about Montenegro, we can observe that Muslims belong to the Bosniak, Albanian, Roma, and Egyptian minorities. Bosniaks identify more through their religious identity and this is the reason why they are the most targeted group in the cases of religious intolerance, whereas discrimination towards Albanians is equally biased on both ethnic and religious identities. Roma and Egyptian communities are the most disadvantaged groups in all social spheres. Intolerance and discrimination towards the last two groups primarily stem from a racial bias.

This year was one of the most difficult years for the Muslim community in Montenegro. The Bosniak minority has been targeted in a series of attacks after the election ended in a new majority dominated by nationalists. The tension that started two years ago because of the Law on Religion and Belief reached its peak. The law was voted at the end of 2019 and the Serbian Orthodox Church organized rallies throughout the entire year demanding its withdrawal. The Church used rallies to campaign against the ruling party, openly supported the opposition, and had a massive influence on the electoral outcome. Although the ruling party promoted EU integration and the opposition used the fight against corruption as their priority, the electoral campaign was dominated by national identity issues. Rallies with strong nationalist narrative spilled over to Serbia, with the support of far-right groups, and were usually followed by incidents. After a rally in the city of Berane, local Bosniaks found graffiti with explicit language on their houses. The graffiti featured a picture of Chetnik leader Dražo Mihajlović and were left only on Bosniaks houses, which tells us that this was a well-organized act. This brought a lot of anxiety and fear within the Muslim community but it was just a beginning.

Later in the year, COVID-19 measures didn’t stop the rallies. The situation calmed down only for the post-election celebrations to burst into a series of violent acts and incidents where Muslims were targets. The most affected were Bosniaks in the city of Pljevlja, a city 40km from the Bosnian border that was almost ethnically cleansed from Muslims in the 1990s.

The 30-year rule of the Democratic Socialist Party ended and now the opposition alliance is in charge. The alliance is comprised mainly of Serb nationalist parties that seek closer ties with Belgrade and Moscow, but their glue is the third-block civic initiative Black on White led by young progressive Dritan Abazović. Although they confirmed that Montenegro will follow the EU integration process further and that they aim to improve democracy, differences in their ideologies raise a lot of concern not only among Muslims, but among all progressive people who are clearly worried about the future of Montenegro.

Physical and Verbal Attacks

Due to the victory of the right-wing block, the Muslim community mainly of Bosniak ethnicity suffered a series of attacks and vandalism incidents in post-election celebrations across the country. Some incidents took place before the election; for instance, a member of the Bosniak Cultural Community, a resident of Luxembourg, in his visit to Montenegro (specifically to the city of Bar), found his car damaged with the threatening message, “We will report you to the Ministry of Internal Affairs because you came to vote.”¹

!Figure 1: The portrait of a Serb war criminal painted on Muslim houses in the city of Berane, northwest of Montenegro, accompanied by explicit language.

Another more frightening assault happened on August 9 when Muslims in the city of Berane woke up to find their houses vandalized with graffiti with portraits of Draža Mihajlović and Pavle Đurišić, Serbian war criminals from WWII who orchestrated the ethnic cleansing of Muslims in the Balkans between 1940 and 1945, resulting in the death and displacement of thousands. Besides the portraits, there was explicit language - swearing targeting Muslim “Turkish” mothers.³ (Fig. 1)

The preceding event of this assault happened a day earlier, in the village Gornje Zaostro, near Berane, when far-right groups gathered to commemorate Pavle Đurišić.

This village was Đurišić’s base during the war, from where he sent reports to Draža Mihajlović about the many atrocities he committed, one of them stating the following: “The operation destroyed the Muslim population regardless of gender and age. Our victims count 22 dead, 32 wounded. Muslim victims count 1,200 soldiers, 8,000 others: woman, elderly, and children.”

The vice president of the local parliament attended the commemoration. The local government condemned the graffiti, but no sanctions for local officials who attended the commemoration or any charges regarding the graffiti were pressed.

Most of the post-election attacks happened in the city of Pljevlja, situated 40km east of the Bosnian border. In 1992, Pljevlja was almost entirely ethnically cleansed when local Muslims were persecuted, tortured, and killed. On election night, Emir Pilav, a resident of Pljevlja, was attacked and got away with slight injuries. On the other side of the city, a father and son were also attacked by a group of hooligans in a local restaurant. Both attacks were followed by insulting shouts of “Turks, get out of here” and “Go away, you cannot stay here anymore.” A resident, Abid Šabanović (22), explained to Al Jazeera that some far-right supporters drove through Bosniak neighborhoods in the following days with the sole aim of provoking residents there. They usually left nationalist and insulting messages. (Figs. 2 and 3) “Such slogans have nothing to do with the election, rather they represent an expression of nationalism,” Šabanović said, adding that there is “fear, [and] anxiety” among Bosniaks.

6. Ibid.
9. Ibid.
In the following days, the glass of the local office of the Islamic Community in Pljevlja was broken and unknown felons left the message “Pljevlja will be Srebrenica.”

(Fig. 3) Reference to the Srebrenica genocide was the most common among these hate crimes. For example, at the entrance of a village near Pljevlja, the name “Srebrenica” was written on the welcoming road sign and messages “Go away Turks” on the roads. (Fig. 3) While the head of the Islamic Community in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Husein Kavazović, called on the Montenegrin authorities to protect the country’s Muslim minority saying that this all brings back the ideologies that have already led to war crimes and genocide in the region during the 1990s.

A local imam, Samir Kadribasić, claimed that the judiciary facilitated further violence by its decision to categorize this act as a misdemeanor and not as a punishable offence. According to Montenegrin legislation, misdemeanors don’t require analysis of evidence but punishable offences do, and, therefore, the messages were not analyzed and CCTV videos were not investigated. In this way, the chances of finding the felons were severely diminished. Kadribasić later resigned due to the overall pressure.

A day after the Islamic Community’s office was vandalized, other nationalist messages were sprayed on venues of local Bosniaks such as ‘Srebrenica’, ‘Turks’, and the ‘4S’ cross - an old Serbian symbol used by Serbian far-right nationalists. (Fig. 4)

Figure 4: Venue owned by Bosniak Muslim vandalized. Sprayed massages read “Srebrenica” and “Turks” with the “4S” symbol of Serbian nationalists.

Insulting messages and hate incidents started occurring in other cities, too. Another northern city, Rozaje, with predominantly Muslim residents, found the “4S” cross graffitied all over the city. In the city of Berane, a football match between local team Buducnost and a visiting team from the city of Plav (with a predominantly Muslim population) was interrupted due to the nationalist chants and insults from local fans. A car from a visiting fan was heavily damaged.

Employment

Earlier this year, the Bosniak National Council stated that there is no direct discrimination of Bosniaks in Montenegro, but that there is a strong presence of institutional discrimination. Northern cities, where Muslims are mainly situated, remain the poorest part of the country with no significant investments. These cities witness large economic migration of people into Western European countries.

It is not possible to uncover whether Islamophobia-based discrimination exists in the employment sphere since information is not publicly available - only statistical data is available. Based on the latter, there is certainly discrimination present but the information does not list the grounds of the alleged discrimination.

Education

One of the main challenges for Montenegro is the lack of willingness for the normative legislature to be put into practice. This problem is visible in almost all spheres including education, where the Bosniak National Council warns that the “Strategy for Minority Policies 2019-2023” can lead to failure. For instance, Bosniak students have the right to education in their mother tongue since 2007. Nevertheless this has never been practiced and all efforts of the Bosniak National Council to practice this right have been unsuccessful. The Bosniak Party has advocated in the parliament that content about Islamic cultural heritage should be added to the curriculum as well as content of the most prominent Bosniak writers and poets from recent history who influenced Montenegrin literature in the best way.

Politics

This election brought historical change since the rule of the Democratic Party of Socialists (DPS) came to an end after almost thirty years. The DPS with the support of its small allies, including two Albanian coalitions and the Bosniak Party, got 40 out of 81 seats, while the far-right opposition For the Future of Montenegro won 41 out of 81 seats. The opposition For the Future of Montenegro is comprised mainly of Serb nationalist parties that seek closer ties with Belgrade and Moscow. Ethnic minorities (the Albanian coalition with one seat and the Bosniak Party with 3 seats) have been officially invited to join the new government. They rejected the offer, stating that the call was only a formality and that there is a lack of trust on the side of the soon-to-be-ruling coalition due to the earlier nationalistic attitude of the pro-Serbian bloc.

For the first time after 1998, ethnic minorities won’t be present in the government. The head of Civil Alliance NGO, Boris Raonic, warned that it was a problem that there are no minority representatives in the new government. “This means minorities will be excluded from decision-making at the state level. The future PM didn’t do enough to convince ethnic minority parties to enter the government,” Raonić told Balkan Investigative Report Network.

Montenegro didn’t experience conflict on its soil during the 1990s wars and in comparison with other ex-Yugoslavian countries, it has the least violent past. Nevertheless, Montenegro played a role in the war that has never been researched. The topic itself is highly avoided in all public spheres including education. Regarding this, the Montenegro Parliament made a significant step by opening the War Crimes Documentation Centre that will collect material related to the Balkan conflicts in the 1990s and the role played in them by Montenegro, stressing that the country must face up to its wartime past. Oana Cristina Popa, the head of the Delegation of the European Union in Montenegro, praised the establishment of this research center, but emphasized that a strategy hasn’t been fully developed.

The unwillingness to address the recent past means that Montenegro has had only eight trials for war crimes and these involved only the lowest level suspects, like cooks and drivers. The last verdict of a crime trial was in December 2019 when former Yugoslav Army soldier Vlado Zmajević was sentenced to 14 years in prison for the murder of four ethnic Albanian civilians in Kosovo in 1999.

Media

The leader in the promotion of anti-Muslim hatred, the website ins4.net has opened a television station, located in Belgrade. Although it is still not working at full capacity, the content of this media service is quite similar to the content of the website, but with guests, discussions, and interactive material. For Srebrenica’s anniversary, they broadcast a discussion on the topic of Srebrenica 25 years later, referring to the genocide as a fabricated event to crown Serbs as “genocidal people.” The opening of this TV station didn’t draw major attention in Montenegro.

The Bosniak National Council expresses strong dissatisfaction with the rights of the Bosniak minority in the field of media and information. Yet again, as a minority, they have the right to a media service in their mother language, and more importantly, they have the right to media content that promotes Bosniak Islamic culture and tradition. Nevertheless, such content doesn’t exist on the National Public Media Service. The Bosniak National Council suggests that the latter should also always include young people from minority communities in order for them to have an opportunity for better education and to gain experience in the media sector. The council adds that among the employees at the National Public Media Service there are only few Bosniaks.29

The Center for Civic Education had conducted more detailed research on the media in the context of the upcoming elections and the electoral campaign where they covered six TV stations, eight websites, and the most popular pages on social networks. For the first time, research was also expanded to the comment sections. The research concludes that anti-Muslim speech is found on the websites in4s.net and Borba.me, both of which have been mentioned in an earlier report.30 There is a significant rise of anti-Muslim speech in the comment sections and in popular social media pages, and particularly on Facebook.31

On online platforms, pro-Serbian websites continue to promote nationalist narratives towards other ethnic groups. Anti-Muslim hatred usually increases when the world commemorates the Srebrenica genocide anniversary or when terrorist attacks take place across Europe. In previous months, articles with the following headlines were published: “Alija Izetbegović a Criminal Who Wanted to Create an Islamic State on Serbian Land”,33 “A Caliphate Is Born in Kosovo (Jihad Started in Serbia and It Was Not Started by ‘Evil’ Arabs from the Far East But by Our Recent Neighbors-Albanians”,34 and “Once More about the Fraud Called Srebrenica”.35 Another website, Borba.me, the newest one in this field, is also known for its racist statements and follows the pattern of inS4.net. It usually copies the material of the latter, for instance, 32. Alija Izetbegović became the first president of the newly independent Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. He served in this role until 1996, when he became a member of the Presidency of Bosnia and Herzegovina, serving until 2000.

headlines like “Bosniaks Provoked Srebrenica” or “State Gives Millions to Muslims and Croats, for Serbs Only Crumbles”,36 and “Future USA Ambassador to Germany Says: “There Is a Muslim Narco-Mafia in Kosovo since 1999.”37

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

The Serbian Orthodox Church remains the main actor in inciting national/religious hostilities and hatred. There have been no legal consequences for such behavior as yet. With the full support of neighboring Serbia and its Church, the Serbian Orthodox Church of Montenegro enjoys huge public support. The political party Democratic Front positioned itself as a defender of the Church and Serbian identity, and its politicians were the most vocal Islamophobes in parliament.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

There are no NGOs or any initiatives dedicated to the suppression and monitoring of hate and hostilities against Muslims in Montenegro. The Islamic Community is the most important institution for the Muslim community and its most relevant representative; however, it doesn’t monitor or collect any data on anti-Muslim hate crimes or speech. Moreover, it does not have any initiatives or projects dealing with Islamophobia specifically. It is important to add that the Islamic Community has the unique status of a religious institution and that it doesn’t belong to the NGO or state sector. The Ministry of Human and Minority Rights, a state institution, deals with human rights in general. It collaborates with the Islamic Community and other minority representatives successfully, and it has initiated many policies and initiatives that were beneficial for the Muslim Community. Yet, so far, the ministry has not recognized Islamophobia as a problem that should be addressed.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Observing previous reports on Islamophobia in Montenegro we can conclude there is an obvious increase in anti-Muslim sentiment in this country with no strategy to fight it. The previous government coined legal frameworks but there has not been significant effort to implement them fully. Unfortunately, the latter cannot be expected from the newly established government.

In regard to the current situation and circumstances, the Muslim Community in Montenegro should mobilize and strengthen its position. The Muslim Community should seek the assistance and support of local, national, regional, and international NGOs, and especially from Muslim NGOs across Europe. It can learn good practice from them and create a new mechanism to advocate and push implementation of already existing laws.

Due to the increased number of incidents towards Muslims, there is a strong recommendation for the establishment of a regional and national reporting mechanism. Besides its primary role, such a mechanism should stimulate stakeholders and other relevant actors in Montenegro to decrease anti-Muslim sentiment and stop further incidents. The regional reporting mechanism should address Islamophobia in the context of the Western Balkans, which in comparison to the rest of Europe has a specific historical background and therefore requires a different approach to Islamophobia and its consequences.

Chronology

- 09.08.2020: Muslim houses in the city of Berane were vandalized by graffiti in which two Serbian war criminals were portrayed alongside explicit language.
- 16.08.2020: The car of a member of the Bosniak Cultural Community organization was damaged and a threatening message was left.
- 01.09.2020: Three people of Bosniak nationality were attacked and beaten. The attackers used nationalist insults: “It’s time for you to go Turks” and “You are not welcome here.”
- 01.09.2020: Few locals shops owned by Muslims were vandalized.
- 02.09.2020: Windows were broken at the local Islamic Community office, and the following message was thrown through a window: “Pljevlja will be Srebrenica.”
- 02.09.2020: “4S” cross graffiti showed up in several locations in the city of Rozaje.
- 03.09.2020: The graffiti “Go away Turks” appeared in several locations in the city of Pljevlje.
- 04.09.2020: Nationalist messages were sprayed on venues of local Bosniaks: “Srebrenica”, “Turks” and the “4S” cross - an old Serbian symbol used by Serbian far-right nationalists.
- 05.09.2020: Graffiti appeared at the entrance of a village near the city of Pljevlja. A picture of the graffiti was published by the local imam on social media.
- 04.10.2020: Interrupted football match due to nationalist chants, the car of a visiting Muslim supporter was damaged.

Executive Summary

In 2020, attacks against mosques continued to be reported, swastikas this year being a favorite and frequently painted onto walls of mosques or on the pavements in the vicinity. Protests against new projects for mosques and against the call for prayer were very common this year as well. According to research by the Social and Cultural Planning Bureau (SCP) the level of discrimination remained about the same as five years ago, and while the numbers have officially decreased, Dutch citizens of Moroccan and Turkish origins, and Muslims still face fairly high levels of discrimination. This occurs to the extent that it has turned into chronic discrimination, leading to the victims retreating from society, losing their faith in institutions, or simply giving up when it comes to education or finding a job.

Research by Meld Islamofobie illustrates that the ban on the facial veil (burqa and niqab) became the source of further polarization, creating hostility and problems where there weren’t any before. Especially with the global COVID-19 pandemic, as a result of which the partial covering of the face become the norm for many people and even obligatory in some public spheres, this hostility started to reach new heights as Muslim women were often accused of wearing a facial veil, even being denied access on some occasions, while they were just wearing a protective mask. According to an analysis by an anti-discrimination organization, the pandemic has led to the discrimination and exclusion of a broad group of Dutch citizens, namely those with an East Asian, Eastern European, Turkish, or Moroccan background.

The threat assessment reports by the National Coordinator of Security and Counterterrorism (NCTV) continue to state that while the possibility exists for a far-right extremist terrorist attack in the Netherlands, such an attack will most likely be conducted by a “lone wolf,” radicalized by the internet. Most attacks on Muslims (the copycat ones in particular), according to the NCTV, are usually not a result of far right extremism but a result of aggravations with society and politics leading from a mixture of personal grief and psychological problems. The NCTV refers to these loners as “Wutbürger,” that is angry, system-hating citizens.
Samenvatting

Dit rapport bespreekt de Islamofobische gebeurtenissen in Nederland die plaatsvonden in 2020. Aanvallen op moskeeen worden nog steeds gerapporteerd, met dit jaar de swastikas als favoriet, vaak geschilderd of gekalkeerd op de muren van de moskeeen of op de stoepen in de buurt. Protesten tegen nieuwe moskeeen en de oproep tot het gebed waren ook veel voorkomend dit jaar. Volgens onderzoek door de SCP het niveau van discriminatie is min of meer hetzelfde gebleven als vijf jaar geleden en hoewel de cijfers officieel zijn gezakt, Nederlandse burgers van Marokkaanse en Turkse origine en Moslims hebben nog vrij veel te maken met discriminatie, tot zoverre dat het de vorm van chronische discriminatie aannemt, wat op zichzelf leidt tot het terugtrekken van de slachtoffers vanuit de samenleving, het verliezen van hun geloof in instituties of tot het simpelweg opgeven wanneer het een opleiding of het vinden van een job betreft.

Onderzoek gedaan door Meld Islamofobie illustreert dat het verbod op de gezichtssluier (boerka en nikab) de bron van verdere polarisatie werd door het creëren van vijandigheid en problemen waar deze vroeger niet bestonden. Vooral met de globale COVID-19 pandemie, door dwelkel het gedeeltelijk bedekken van het gezicht de norm werd voor veel mensen, zelfs verplicht in sommige openbare ruimtes, bereikte deze vijandigheid nieuwe hoogtes wanneer Moslim vrouwen vaak werden beschuldigd van het dragen van een gezichtssluier, soms zelfs de toegang werden ontzegd, terwijl ze slechts een masker droegen. Volgens een analyse gedaan door een anti-discriminatie organisatie leidde de coronacrisis tot de discriminatie en uitsluiting van een grote groep Nederlandse burgers, namelijk die met een Oost-Aziatische, Oost-Europese, Turkse of Marokkaanse achtergrond.

De NCTV’s rapporten genaamd Dreigingsbeeld Terrorism Nederland blijven nog steeds constateren dat, hoewel in Nederland de mogelijkheid bestaat op een rechtse terroristische aanval, deze waarschijnlijk zouden gepleegd worden door een ‘eenzame wolf’, geradicaliseerd door het internet. Volgens de NCTV zijn de meeste aanvallen op Moslims (vooral de copycat aanvallen) meestal niet het gevolg van een duidelijk rechts-extremistisch gedachtengoed maar eerder het resultaat van grieven over the samenleving en de politiek die voorstammen uit een mengeling van persoonlijk leed en psychologische problemen. De NCTV refereert naar deze eenlingen als ‘Wutbürger’, boze systeem-hatende burgers.
Country Profile
EIR 2020

Country: Netherlands

Type of Regime: Parliamentary representative democracy, constitutional monarchy, and a decentralized unitary state.

Form of Government: The government constitutionally consists of the king and the cabinet ministers. The king’s role is limited to the formation of government.

Ruling Parties: People’s Party for Freedom and Democracy (VVD), Christian Democrats (CDA), Democrats 66 or D66, and the faith-based Christian Union (ChristenUnie)

Last Elections: 2019 provincial elections: In terms of seats, the new far-right party FvD of Thierry Baudet won the most votes of the top three parties, with almost double those of the PVV. 2019 European elections: The PvdA won 6 seats, doubling the number compared to the last elections, while the VVD won 4. The FvD, again, came out the true victor of the elections by winning 3 seats, despite being a brand-new party (by comparison, the PVV won no seats).

Total Population: 17,418,465 (2020)

Major Languages: Dutch

Official Religion: No official religion (secularism)

Statistics on Islamophobia: The Social and Cultural Planning Bureau (SCP) published the second report on their research on discrimination experienced in the Netherlands stating that Muslims experience relatively high levels of discrimination and that they feel strongly stigmatized, discriminated, and excluded - to the extent of people retreating from society.

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: According to the aforementioned report, the amount of discrimination has more or less stayed the same compared to five years ago, when the report was first published. The research states that there are concerns about discrimination taking chronic or institutional forms. Thirty-three percent of Muslims have stated that they face a negative attitude and unequal treatment.

– Hijab Ban: No
– Halal Slaughter Ban: In 2019, the Party for Animals submitted a new bill proposal to have slaughter without sedation completely banned by law, but it didn't pass the Chamber of Representatives. In 2018, there were already restrictions set in place that stated that if an animal is not insensitive to pain within 40 seconds of slaughter, it must be shot.
– Minaret Ban: No
– Circumcision Ban: No
– Burka Ban: On 26 June 2018, the Dutch Senate approved the bill “Partial Prohibition of Face-Covering Clothing.” The ban went into effect in August 2019.
– Prayer Ban: No, it depends on local decision since the European Court of Justice ruled in March 2017 that employers can ban their staff from displaying religious symbols, including taking time off for prayers.
Introduction

The year 2020 has been a very different year for all, with the COVID-19 pandemic affecting many to most aspects of our lives including Islamophobia. While physical attacks, in general, seem to have become fewer in 2020, one must not forget that this is most likely due to the fact that there were several lockdowns, people were not allowed to get together, and, in general, it was recommended to stay at home as much as possible — and hence there was less opportunity for Islamophobic acts and less incitement. In the past, the mere presence of Muslims used to be enough for Islamophobic acts to take place such as insulting or spitting. Now, the focus of Islamophobia has turned to mosques, with many mosques being protested against, swastikas being chalked on them or in the vicinity, and the call for prayer being considered a nuisance. Already several reports have been released stating their concern about the polarization of society when it comes to COVID-19, and about the fact that several immigrant groups (amongst them Muslims as well) are being targeted and accused of spreading the disease and not adhering to the rules. While not being explicit, one finds articles about areas close to mosques being more frequently tested, mosques being suspected of being a source of infection, and “signs Eid has already led to an increase in infections.”

The year 2020 has gone down in history as a year with more reports on discrimination and Islamophobia (be it a subtopic or on its own), with clear statements that this research is only the tip of the iceberg. Many refrain from reporting as they believe it won’t change anything, they won’t be taken seriously, or the incident itself is not severe enough, indicating a severe lack of faith in the governmental institutions that are supposed to be there to help civilians. Furthermore, a fear is often expressed, be it directly or indirectly, of discrimination and Islamophobia being chronic and institutionalized. On the other hand, 2020 was also a year where racism and Islamophobia were more clearly expressed by certain politicians, especially PVV founder Geert Wilders. While Wilders expressed his dismay about Islam openly before as well, it was still less frequent and somehow hidden behind statistics on what the people think of Muslims, stating that Islam doesn’t belong in the Netherlands. This year, he was much more explicit, stating again and again that Islam is a monster that needs to be gotten rid of.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

On January 6, a possible arson attempt was made against the now infamous Islamic high school Cornelius Haga Lyceum in Amsterdam. Students discovered that a brick had been thrown through a window, while also finding a tin of lighter fluid in the playground. According to principal Soner Atasoy the inflammable liquid was poured inside and the teacher’s chair was soaked in it. The school called the police for further investigation. According to Atasoy, he’s been receiving threatening emails ever since the commotion around the school triggered by the National Defense Agency stating that the school allegedly has ties with terroristic organizations.2

On the night of March 22, posters of protest were attached against the doors and windows of the Al-Himmah Mosque in Poelenberg, a neighborhood in Zaan- dan. The posters illustrate a mosque with a red ban sign over it, with the text “No mosque” written as well. The posters were hung in name of the movement Rechts in Verzet (Right in Resistance). The chairman of the mosque stated that they went to the police but were advised not to take any further steps.3

On April 2, the Social and Cultural Planning Bureau (SCP) published the second report of its research on discrimination in the Netherlands; the first report was published in January 2014. It reached the conclusion that 27% of the Dutch population experiences discrimination, a percentage roughly the same as five years earlier. However, the rise of the amount of discrimination is the most significant in the educational sector (22%). Discrimination in education is often of a serious nature such as violence, threats, and sexual harassment. On the job market, the percentage of discrimination is quite high: 13% of job seekers is certain they have experienced it and another 13% suspect they have experienced discrimination, without being entirely certain. It is very difficult to prove that one was eliminated in a selection process due to discrimination. Discrimination by official authorities, while having decreased, is still experienced by 9% to 16% of all the Dutch. Additionally, second-generation immigrants experience more discrimination than first-generation immigrants. These experiences include discrimination in the house market and in their contact with the police. The results are major: people retreat from society, lose their faith in institutions, give up when it comes to education or finding a job, or indicate having to accept a job way below their educational level. While the Turkish and Moroccan Dutch experience less discrimination than in 2013, they still belong to the groups of people who experience the most discrimination. People with a migration background (in particular the aforementioned ethnic groups) and Muslims experience relatively high levels of discrimination (in sharp contrast, elders and the native Dutch experience relatively little), stating they feel strongly stigmatized, discriminated, and excluded. While the discrimination experienced by this group has diminished in the (semi)public sphere and on the job market, they experience more severe and chronic discrimination. The research also showed that discrimination is barely reported to the organizations that register discrimination. Discrimination in the form of vandalism, threats, and violence is experienced relatively less, but is reported more often. Those who report discrimination stated that their reasons for doing so were not so much their need for the discrimination to stop and the discriminator to be punished as their need to tell their story, to make clear that discrimination is happening, and to process what happened. While discrimination experienced during job hunting is one of the types least reported, discrimination at the workplace is the form most reported. As a result of discrimination, fear, loneliness, and feelings of insecurity can develop, and people start to turn away from the assumed perpetrators or even people with a similar profile, avoiding places, and situations that might be risky.

At the end of May, the Utrecht branch of the PVV called on people to protest against the call for prayer being magnified by loudspeakers. The party launched a website where residents of Utrecht can object to the call for prayer by the local mosques. Residents can sign a protest letter, found on the PVV website, and forward it to the municipality. According to the PVV, many residents are against these calls for prayers. The letter writes,

The mosque calls out to prayer for four minutes and this twice a day in a foreign language. As a resident, I disagree with this. With this letter I wish to appeal to your common sense and empathy to stop this nuisance.

According to the party, the letter has been signed a couple of dozen times.

On September 21, a report was published on the effects of the burqa ban that started being implemented in August 2019. According to research by Meld Islamofo-bie (Report Islamophobia), the ban is mainly used as an excuse to exclude, discriminate, and verbally and physically attack women with a facial veil as well as women Muslim women without. While the ban claimed to target the improvement of communication and security, it did anything but that. In its press release, Meld Islamofobie stated that there are three important conclusions to be drawn from this report:

1. Muslimas with and without a facial veil have indicated often becoming a target of Islamophobia ever since the law started being implemented.
2. Muslimas are especially victimized in places where the ban does not apply, such as parks, shops, and on the street.
3. The police are often not fully up to date as to what exactly the scope of the ban is, making them an unreliable party to turn to.7

There is also a reference to an article published earlier in Algemeen Dagblad (AD), one of the more popular newspapers in the Netherlands, about the burqa ban. In the article, the newspaper informed its readers that according to the law, they are allowed to implement the ban. (Fig. 1)

Figure 1: The article instructs the reader when and how to approach a woman wearing a burqa, informing them that they can call the police. The rights explained in the article are based on the statement of a spokesman of the Public Prosecution Service.8

According to Meld Islamofobie, this statement led to all kinds of online calls for burqa witch hunts. While no massive witch hunts occurred, a wave of verbal and physic Islamophobic attacks on Muslim women took place. Furthermore, the report stressed that the sectors where the ban is applicable had not requested such a ban. The Council of State, Amnesty International, and the College voor de Rechten van de

Mens (The Netherlands Institute for Human Rights) expressed harsh criticism of the ban. In the end, the ban created problems where there were none. Hence, Meld Islamofobie has called for the annulment of the ban.9

Around the same period, a number of copies (the exact number is not known) of an anonymous, provocative letter was distributed in Nieuwe Kadekwartier in Arnhem. The discovery of the letter was shared via social media by the chairman of the platform for chronically ill and disabled people, Dick Cochius. From the envelope it was clear that the letter was addressed to the residents of the Nieuwe Kadekwartier and the center for the chronically ill. The letter was openly anti-Islamic and aimed to warn against the relocation of the Ayasofya Mosque. The mosque intends to move from another neighborhood to a new building in Nieuwe Kadekwartier. The letter makes a connection between Islamization and the loss of freedom in World War II, and writes about reconquering what the Dutch fought and died for in Arnhem. Cochius expressed his disgust with the letter and forwarded it to the mayor of Arnhem, Ahmed Marcouch, who stated that the police are investigating the matter.10

According to an analysis published in September, based on the 139 reports filed to anti-discrimination organizations, the pandemic led to the discrimination and exclusion of a broad group of Dutch citizens, namely those with an East Asian, Eastern European, Turkish, or Moroccan background. Discriminatie.nl, the national umbrella organization of anti-discrimination instances, expressed its concern, sharing that there were several complaints about people of color being approached and held accountable because of the ban on assemblies. One report mentioned being struck by the fact that on news reporting on COVID-19 migrants with headscarves were often portrayed.11

On September 13, tens of slogans were found written in chalk in the vicinity of a site where there are plans to construct a new mosque. The slogans were written by sympathizers of Rechts in Verzet, an extreme-right protest group similar to PEGIDA, and included statements such as “No mosque in our street’ and ‘Influence Erdogan to zero.”12

On the night of September 21, a couple of swastikas were found chalked on a street in Enschede, along with “SS” signs. While the perpetrator is still unknown, recently a similar event took place where messages against the opening of a mosque planned at the location were chalked on the pavement.\(^{13}\)

On the morning of September 30, a resident in Transvaal, The Hague, discovered a copy of the Qur’an torn into pieces and spread all across the pavement. After filming it, the resident cleaned up the mess and contact the local police. The chairman of Islam Democrats Tahsin Çetinkaya stated that it was a clear provocation and unacceptable, and that he intended to take the matter to the municipality. The police, however, stated on their Twitter page that they are in possession of the video, that they have researched the matter, and there is “strong evidence” that the person responsible is someone who is already known to the police as showing “confused behavior.” They went on to state that he is already being helped by healthcare and that they intend to see how they can further help this person.\(^{14}\)

On November 10, a brick was thrown at a window of the Osmanlı Mosque in Zaandam. Mosque volunteer Oğuz Han stated that they had no idea what the intention was, and that they had not faced a similar event in the past. Next to the broken window there was a camera which recorded a person being addressed by a member of the mosque, asking if he needed help, upon which the person immediately fled. He later returned to throw the brick. Luckily, the building was empty at the time. The mosque filed a complaint to the police who agreed to make more frequent rounds in the neighborhood.\(^{15}\)

On December 13, three swastikas were painted on the door and the wall of the Ulu Mosque in Utrecht and on two synagogues in the vicinity. Witnesses saw the perpetrator painting the swastikas on Saturday night, and the police managed to arrest him. The minister of security and justice stated on Facebook that he intends to arrange more police protection around the mosque. Board chairman Yüce Aydemir expressed his worry about the safety and well-being of all mosque-goers. “We need to keep in mind there are people with serious feelings of hate towards Muslims, who might be capable of switching to more drastic measurements,” he added.\(^{16}\) Later, it turned out that in the past, the suspect had disrupted the Friday prayer held in the Ulu Mosque. The board recognized the perpetrator as being the same person who in April of the year before, had grabbed the microphone at the beginning of the service and said, “You killed four Dutch, kill me as well then. I fought against Turks. You Turks are all terrorists.” According to Aydemir, this is the third time the same man harasses the mosque as in 2018 another incident had taken place. After the second incident, the person had to appear in court, which ruled that he was not accountable for his actions as he was psychotic at the time. The court told the man “to take great care of himself so it wouldn’t happen again, as many people were severely startled by what happened.” A couple of days after the third incident, he was conditionally released. One of the conditions was for the suspect to seek medical treatment since according to the investigation the man’s actions stemmed from a mental disorder. He is also not to show himself near the mosque; if he does, he is to be arrested again.

Employment

In April 2019, a young man founded a new enterprise in the education sector that focused among others on Islamic knowledge. He wanted to open a business account at Bunq, a Dutch bank that carries the slogan “Bank of the Free,” but his application was rejected. As a reason the bank stated that according to their acceptance policy they don’t open accounts for religious organizations. The rejection email stated the following,

Your company was indeed denied for being a religious organization and it falls out of acceptance policy. It concerns every single religion. This is in line with our current acceptance policy and risk profile, and is because we are still a relatively young player in the market. This can, however, change in the future, so if you like, we can let you know when that is the case.

Upon this, the young man filed a complaint at Meld Islamofobie, who advised him to present his case to the College voor de Rechten van de Mens (CRM, The Netherlands Institute for Human Rights), which he did. On June 22, 2020, the CRM decided that Bunq, with their acceptance policy, is guilty of direct discrimination based on religion because they make a clear distinction between organizations with a religious signature and those without, which is forbidden unless there is a lawful exception. Bunq claimed there is a lawful exception, namely preventing money laundering and the financing of terrorism, two specific laws in the Dutch justice system. The CRM, however, rejected Bunq’s reasoning by stating that these laws do not compel the exclusion of individuals or organizations without further research merely because they adhere to or represent a certain religion, and, therefore Bunq’s approach is forbidden by law. Bunq ended up changing their acceptance policy. Meld Islamofobie considers this case as the perfect example of institutionalized Islamophobia as it is clear that in this instance Islam is automatically correlated with terrorism. It has called on all Muslims faced with similar types of discrimination to come forward and report their cases.

Education

At the end of November, a high school in Leiden became the focus of criticism on social media. During religion class, a teacher gave the students a couple of questions to answer in an essay. These questions, however, caused much dismay among some students and they posted the questions on Twitter, causing protest all over the country. The questions were:

What does the freedom of religion mean for a Muslim who commits an attack? How can we protect ourselves against fundamentalism? Why are attacks being committed in the name of Islam? Why do people believe in a religion that causes so much violence? Why are there so many Muslim terrorists?

The head of the school, Ron Onderwater, made a statement that the school distanced itself from “a couple of essay questions” and that they do not judge any religion or religious belief as a whole based merely on the acts of a small group. He added that the school was aggrieved that some felt hurt by this essay as it was not their intention. While some praised this statement, others criticized the lack of total distancing and the fact that the issue of such questions ending up in a classroom was not adequately addressed and dealt with. Especially after the murder on Samuel Paty in Paris, the insinuation that all Muslims are terrorists hit a particularly raw nerve.

The brutal murder of Samuel Paty caused a lot of commotion both within and outside of the educational sphere. After the attack, the mayor of Amsterdam, Femke Halsema, stated that she intended to sit down with teachers in order to find out if they feel threatened while doing their jobs and what they need. She claimed to have received signals that teachers are ill at ease at the moment and she argued that it was known for a longer time that teachers don’t feel free to discuss all topics because of the classroom atmosphere or the attitude of the parents. Amsterdam has been focusing on citizenship education, also called “Amsterdahood,” for a while now, dealing with sensitive topics such as discrimination and anti-Semitism. However, Prime Minister Mark Rutte, in reaction to all the unrest after the murder, stated that he felt free to discuss every topic with his students. Rutte has been teaching social sciences for ten years at the Johan de Witt College and stressed that he does not experience any obstruction when discussing any topic whatsoever.

After all the commotion about the cartoons illustrating the Prophet Muhammad, during which especially extreme-right figures called on people to display and share these cartoons to show they “won’t bow to Islam,” the imam of the Blue Mosque in Nieuw-West Yassin Elforkani called for a law to penalize insulting the Prophet Muhammad. In response, Elforkani received heaps of death threats and decided, after meeting with the mosque’s board, not to hold any Friday sermons at the mosque for the time being. Elforkani explained that these were far from the first threats he has received. He said, “The police have a whole file. But the last couple of days, I’m being overwhelmed by threats via social media and other channels.” Mayor Femke Halsema stated that the police are investigating the threats. According to Halsema, it is “unacceptable and indigestible” that Elforkani is the constant target of intimidation and threats, as he holds a civilized and democratic debate on blasphemy, adding him to a long Dutch tradition in which religious and political speakers openly speak out on the extent of freedom of speech, and adding that he is an example of public figures who consequently condemn violence and intimidation. A petition was started by imam Ismail Abou Soumayyah from a mosque in The Hague to penalize the insulting of the Prophet Muhammad and has gathered over 120,000 signatures. Elforkani eventually resigned from his position as imam of the Blue Mosque because of the pressure caused by all of the threats. He stated that he was not caving in to the threats, but that despite having far heavier security than ever before, the situation has never been this extreme.

The year 2020 saw Geert Wilders, founder and head of the PVV (Party for Freedom), become particularly active and outspoken against Islam. Before he would often refer to Islam not belonging in the Netherlands and the West in general, supporting his opinions by polls, his most provocative act being a call for the drawing of cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad by his followers on Twitter, himself sharing a cartoon portraying him as a vicious, violent man. In 2020, he made this a recurrent trend, especially after the murder of Samuel Paty in Paris, which occurred after the latter had shown a similar cartoon. Alongside this, he was more openly outspoken not only against Islam but towards the Prophet Muhammad, referring to him as a cruel, vicious man; and his religion and himself as oppressive towards women, barbaric, and violent in general. He claimed that the headscarf is a sign of oppression and does not belong in the Netherlands - and neither does Islam in general.

At the end of October, a racist comment on Twitter made by the BPA (Burger Partij Amersfoort) party foreman Hans van Wegen caused a lot of dismay among fellow politicians, who claimed that this time van Wegen had crossed a line. At least one councilor intends to file a complaint. In reaction to a Flemish news article about a young man of non-Dutch descent being sentenced “only” to community service for purposefully colliding into his driving instructor, he wrote, “His name is Youssef and not Henk, so he gets away with it.”

Amersfoort Lucas Bolsius addressed van Wegen in exceptionally harsh words because of his “very unrespectful” and “utterly damaging” words. He stated that as mayor it is his duty to guard the integrity within politics and that van Wegen ignores all rules, having no respect for the office he is holding, thus damaging the council, politics as a whole, and the city.32

Figure 3: “Every Islamic headscarf is a label for Muslims and a victory for the oppressive imperialistic Islam. They do not belong in governmental buildings and wearing a headscarf there should be forbidden. Islam does not belong in the Netherlands.”33

In 2017, a crisis in the department of deradicalization of the municipality of Amsterdam began. Deradicalization expert Saadia Ait-Taleb was accused of fraud and of having an inappropriate relationship with a contractor in 2016. They were said to have messed with the bills, filing invoices for work that has never been done, thus having committed fraud, causing for her immediate dismissal. After three years of fruitless investigation, nothing whatsoever was found against her to justify the accusations and her dismissal. In reality there was a secret campaign held by the late mayor Eberhard van der Laan, who wished to change the minds of radicalizing youth by recording short films. The money claimed by the invoices was indeed used to produce these short films, leaving all accusations unjustified. The court cleared both of all blame at the beginning of July. However, Ait-Taleb’s dismissal has not yet been withdrawn. While the court approved, it is currently under appeal.36 The municipality and Ait-

Taleb have sat down to discuss the arrangement concerning her forced dismissal ordered by van der Laan in 2017. According to insiders, however, these discussions are very difficult.37 None of the accusations have even been dismissed by anyone, neither fellow colleagues nor prominent members of government, nor has any research been done, making this matter “extremely painful,” as the city council expressed. The council wishes to know what role the municipal Bureau of Integrity played as they were the ones who transferred the case to the Public Prosecution Service. Furthermore, they want to know if institutional racism was the cause behind all this. Several witnesses stated that van der Laan no longer trusted Muslims to work on the deradicalization file. The current mayor of Amsterdam Femke Halsema stated that she felt Ait-Taleb’s pain but that it was not possible to make any comments on the case before all procedures are completed. At the end of August, a large part of the city council asked for a public apology towards Ait-Taleb. Halsema, however, has refused to do so to date.38 As of November 2020 the department of deradicalization of Amsterdam has still not recovered. Many politicians complain of a lack of efficiency when it comes to the department, claiming that their network of informants is not up to date and properly in touch with society. Furthermore, the way Ait-Taleb and her network of key figures were pushed aside causes distrust within the Amsterdam Muslim society towards the municipality to this day. Because of this, the municipality is not aware of what’s going on within the Muslim community and signals of possible radicalization reach the municipality far too late. Especially after the attacks in Paris and Vienna, the situation in the department became more urgent.39 At the beginning of November, more than forty functionaries of the municipality of Amsterdam complained about an unsafe work atmosphere. The main cause of this, they claimed, was the treatment Ait-Taleb received throughout the past three years. According to the functionaries (mostly native Dutch), colleagues of non-Western descent often feel mistrusted, especially those who are Muslim. Since Ait-Taleb’s case, many don’t feel comfortable anymore at work and even stay at home sick after seeing how a colleague was under attack and was not protected by the municipality. They say, even a functionary accused of misconduct deserves a “more reasonable, just and humane treatment.”40 According to the functionaries, it is high time the municipality recognizes its mistakes, quickly and generously covers the damage done, and makes negotiations more public. Denk party member Mourad Taimounti stated that he had talked to several functionaries who had dealt with the Bureau of Integrity before and that none of them had had any positive experiences, and one was at home with PTSD. According to Taimounti, the staff at the Bureau of Integrity are called “Moroccan-hunters.” Taimounti regrets Halsema’s lack of willingness to make a clean sweep after all the abuses of her predecessor. In response to the letter, Halsema stated that she was well aware of what is going on in the city, thanks to the current (in)formal networks and contacts, who are, unlike the key figures, not exclusively focused on fighting radicalization.

In October, a new report entitled “Muslima – A Research on the Representation of Muslimas in the Photo Database of the ANP” was released by the Muslima organization S.P.E.A.K. The research was conducted by Çiğdem Yüksel and focused on the way Muslim women are represented on photographs uploaded onto the Dutch photo database ANP (Algemeen Nederlands Persbureau, General Dutch Press Bureau), the largest news agency in the Netherlands that was founded in 1934. In order to do so, the search term “Moslima” (Muslima) was used to narrow down the results, which were then again subcategorized into three different time periods: 1995-2000 (only 10 pictures), 2005-2010 (2,016 photographs), and 2015-2020 (2,456 photos).

In 60% of the pictures the portrayed Muslims are alone, in 20% of them they appear in a pair, and in 11% three or more persons are depicted. More than half of the pictures were taken on the street, the marketplace, or on public transportation; others were taken on a daytrip or at school; 5% were taken in a religious environment; and only a couple of pictures were taken of Muslimas visiting a cultural institution, doing sports, or working. Those who were photographed while working were often cashiers. Eighty-two percent of the portrayed women had a headscarf, and 13% of them doing sports wore a niqab or burqa. Women wearing a niqab appeared more often in close-ups (45%) and were recognizable (51%). When it comes to emotions expressed in the pictures, 37% of the pictures portrayed women with no clearly recognizable emotion, 38% of the pictures where emotions were visible portrayed Muslim women looking serious, with only 16% looking cheerful. By comparison, while the Getty Images database shows similarity when it comes to portraying Muslim women on the streets and during events, these images are alternated by a much larger range in variety of settings and background when using the key word “Muslima,” e.g., a

Muslima on her yoga mat, a Muslima in a business setting, behind her laptop and on the phone, a Muslima driving, a Muslima being a referee during a soccer match, etc. In the Getty Images database words and descriptions are added that are directly linked to the photograph, illustrating what is portrayed, while in the ANP database, more often than not, words are added that are not directly linked such as “Salafism” and “orthodox Muslims.” The research concludes that the database’s pictures give a monotone impression of Muslimas regarding all facets of life with pretty much all of them being covered (usually in the same style as well), not portrayed as active citizen participating in society, nor as individuals within their own social environment, as for example, a mother hugging her child.43

Justice System

On September 4, the court decided that Geert Wilders was guilty of insulting Moroccans as a group during an election night on March 19, 2014. According to the court, Wilders consciously uttered those infamous words in front of a camera. Given that only a few days earlier, he had made a similar remark at a marketplace at The Hague, it was decided that he was conscious of the consequences of his actions. Wilders had been found guilty before and took matters to appeal. However, he will not be sentenced to any punishment. Nor is he found guilty of inciting hatred or discrimination as the aim of Wilders was not focused on driving his audience to hatecrimes or racism.44 In reaction to the verdict, at the press center right outside of the court, Wilders stated what he had allegedly been saying throughout the trial as well: that the Netherlands has become a corrupt country. Wilders announced that he intended to fight the verdict and this time take matters to the Supreme Court.

The Dreigingsbeeld Terrorism Nederland (Terrorist Threat Assessment Netherlands) is a report published three times a year to summarize the investigations on any possible threat(s) faced by the Netherlands by the National Coordinator of Security and Counterterrorism (Nationaal Coördinator Terrorismebestrijding en Veiligheid, NCTV). The NCTV’s most recent publications (52 and 53) state more or less the same thing: while the possibility exists for a far-right extremist terrorist attack in the country, this attack will most likely come from a “lone wolf.” The NCTV draws this conclusion from the fact that these Dutch loners are likely to be radicalized and pushed to carry out a terrorist attack via the internet given that the Dutch extreme right organizations are very fragmented and lack a leader to drive their followers to acts of terror. According to the NCTV, the real threat of loners lies in the fact that they can radicalize in an unorganized fashion online, and they manage to stay off the radar for a longer time because they have no ties to a (registered) organization. The terrorist attack in Christchurch is thought to have found resonance with a number of individuals in the Netherlands; however, according to the NCTV, this is not a result of clear-cut, right-extremist thought but more the result of aggravations with society and politics stemming from a mixture of personal grief and psychological problems. The NCTV refers to these loners as “Wutbürger,” that is angry system-hating citizens. On the other hand, the NCTV states that while these loners are not part of a (local) neo-Nazi organization, they often feel part of a larger worldwide online society. Glorification of similar attacks on extreme right forums is a source of inspiration for the like-minded. Far-right extremists worldwide are more and more active on alternative platforms and chat forums such as 4chan and Gab, on messenger apps such as Telegram, and gaming apps such as Discord. The far-right online communities and channels are roughly dividable into three categories: “anti-Muslim and anti-migrants”, “national socialistic”, and “identitarian and ethno-nationalistic.” The anti-Semitic and racist periodical Siege, which was published throughout the eighties, is still present in the narratives on international online forums. The Siege narrative is about systematically and randomly stirring as much unrest as possible with the aim of causing a “race war,” leading to the great kladderadatsch (crash) and democracy vanishing, only to be replaced by a state where the superior white race is in charge.45

In light of the COVID-19 pandemic, the NCTV stated that the negative socioeconomic and sociopolitical consequences could be important for the threat development. Under the pressure of the politicization and economic impact of the crisis, the social cohesion could come under threat and there could be a possible opening of more space for extreme points of view. Nationalistic and xenophobic tendencies have increased in the West throughout the past couple of years and these will most likely increase even more, alongside attacks on the liberal international legal order and the national democratic legal state. According to the NCTV, as a consequence of the worsening circumstances, people might become more susceptible to psychosocial and psychiatric problems, making them more vulnerable to radicalization.46

For many years now, Geert Wilders is the first name to pop into one’s mind when Islamophobia in the Netherlands is discussed. His criticism of Islam and his Is-

Islamophobic views have been voiced ever since 9/11 in particular; however, he had started expressing his concerns on “Muslim extremism” as early as 1999. In 2020, he reached a new peak in the number of Islamophobic statements, especially in parliament and on Twitter, where time and again he stated that Islam does not belong in the West, that it is a threat to Dutch society (and all Western society for that matter), and that the Prophet Muhammad was cruel and blood-thirsty (see previous section on politics).

A more recent player in the field is Thierry Baudet’s FvD (Forum for Democracy). Originally founded as a think tank and turned into a party in 2016, the FvD participated in the 2017 general elections, where it won 2 seats. In the 2019 provincial elections, the FvD won 86 seats across the 12 provinces. In South Holland, North Holland, and Flevoland, it became the largest party, drawing double the votes of the PVV. A third of the FvD’s voters originally voted for the PVV in 2017.47 The FvD expressed its unwavering support to Israel as, according to the party, it is a successful business partner and a democracy. The FvD also supports Bashar al-Assad in the Syrian Civil War. The party wants the Netherlands to withdraw from the EU, restrict migration, and enshrine into law the preservation of Dutch culture while restricting Islamic practices.48 An interesting note is that both parties – the FvD and the PVV – openly support Israel and Jews, while many of their far-right followers are in fact anti-Semitic. In November 2020, claims were made that Baudet had made several severely racist and anti-Semitic statements during a dinner with party members. One of the members shared this information via a letter to the party leadership and the content of the letter was confirmed by two other party members present. However, after a vote of confidence within the party, 75% of the party members were in favor of Baudet remaining the party leader.49

The main Islamophobic organizations and movements in the Netherlands are PEGIDA and Identitair Verzet, the Dutch wing of the pan-European Identitarian movement. PEGIDA, too, is pan-European with German roots, and stands for Patriotische Europäer gegen die Islamisierung des Abendlandes (Patriotic Europeans against the Islamization of the Occident). As is clear from its name, its main - if not only concern - is Islam and its so-called threat to Western civilization. It was founded in 2014, with its Dutch offshoot being founded in 2015. The head of PEGIDA Nederland (PEGIDA Netherlands) is Edwin Wagensveld.

According to the latest yearly report (2019) published by the College voor de Rechten van de Mens (The Netherlands Institute for Human Rights) two-thirds of the people who have faced discrimination on the streets, online, or on public transportation, show adaptive or avoidance behavior. The Institute calls out to the government to appoint a coordinator to deal with discrimination in the public sphere. According to the report, the large number of anti-racist demonstrations proves the severity of the problem. It concluded that discriminating behavior takes place in all facets of life, from education and the work floor to the public sphere. The numbers illustrate that 28% of the people that experience discrimination in the public sphere, face such behavior because of their background (skin color, national or ethnic background, or language). One in five people who have faced discrimination on public transportation have indicated that they no longer take the train, tram, bus, or metro. Furthermore, there are religious people who because of experiencing discrimination no longer openly come forward with their religious identity. Thus, discriminative behavior also impedes other human rights such as freedom of religion. The Institute suggests the appointment of a coordinator to deal with these types of discrimination in public spaces. This coordinator can make sure that the government develops an overarching, integral, and structural method to deal with all forms of discriminative behavior. The Institute also warns against the normalization of discriminative behavior. To prevent this from happening, the Institute finds that the government needs to play a central role, to keep working on awareness, and continue sending across the message that everyone has a place in Dutch society. Dutch leaders and politicians should come forth when severe cases of discrimination take place. As several researches have indicated so far, very few people report the discrimination they have faced to the police. The Institute also concluded that 7 in 10 people have not filed a report to the police as they have very little confidence their reports will actually lead to something, or they believe that the incident was not severe enough to report. This illustrates that discrimination already has been, to some degree, normalized.50

According to the Euro-Mediterranean Centre Migration & Development (EMCEMO) and the Collective against Islamophobia and Discrimination (Collectief tegen Islamofobie en Discriminatie), the attacks by “a handful of fanatics lead to Muslims in the Netherlands and Europe to be even more stigmatized and that their daily life, already heavily affected by discrimination, racism and Islamophobia and all forms of exclusion, becomes even more complicated”.51

The municipality of Amsterdam launched a campaign to stop discrimination, which is still prominent in the city. With the support of several famous Dutch citizens, it placed posters all across the town calling on people to be an “Amsterdamer,” a true resident of the city, one who is open to different cultures, religions, and lifestyles, and who values this richness. The campaign not only calls on people to be more tolerant, but actually to speak up against injustice and when they see discrimination, to intervene rather than turn away.52

During this research on the current status quo of Islam and Muslims in the Netherlands in 2020 several red flags popped up: polarization, low reportage of discrimination, chronic Islamophobia, institutionalized Islamophobia, and the concept of “Wutbürger” introduced by the NCTV. While they might seem unrelated at first, they are actually accelerating one another, affecting one another, dragging everything into a vicious circle that is becoming harder and harder to break loose from. While the fact that there is more research on discrimination is undeniably a step in the right direction, it will remain nothing but a small step if these reports are not heard by the relevant governmental institutions, which seems largely not to have been the case in 2020. In order to be able to make a change in the oncoming years, one needs to pay close attention to the aforementioned red flags and deal with them as soon as possible.

Firstly, governmental institutions need to realize that polarization is partly the result of a severe lack of trust experienced by many Muslims towards governmental institutions. While research shows that many blame social media for the growing polarization, one must not forget that social media is an accelerator, feeding on what is already there, that social media nurture the seeds of feelings and perspectives already present in us. However, it is these seeds that one must focus on: why are the seeds of distrust towards governmental instances that lead to a general distrust towards society and the “other” even present in the first place? An important note here is that most research by governmental institutions on Islamophobia is actually not directly or mainly on Islamophobia, but on “discrimination based on religion” and/or on “descent.” This in itself illustrates how Islamophobia and all the acts of discrimination experienced by Muslim citizens in the Netherlands are not (yet?) important enough to deserve their own research. This reflects exactly how many Muslims in the Netherlands actually feel – i.e., not important enough to be dealt with, to be helped. In order to remove this lack of trust towards governmental institutions, the government needs to understand that some Muslims might have a different perspective on life due to their religion and their cultural background, making them often misunderstood or not heard by people who do not share their perspectives, especially non-Muslim, native Dutch citizens. Thus, the government needs to make its institutions more accessible to Muslims by making sure that they have access to people who share or, at least, understand their background, and by placing Muslim employees in all different levels of governmental service along with non-Muslim employees. In this way, Muslim citizens will feel represented, and the government will send out a strong anti-polarization message by showing all Dutch citizens are represented.

This brings us to the second topic - coping with chronic and institutionalized Islamophobia. As illustrated by the research by Yüksel on the photo database of the Netherlands’ biggest press agency, Muslim women are severely mis- and unrepresented in the media. They are turned into almost unhuman beings, beings that are stripped of all feelings, interests, and opinions, facilitating the otherization and objectification of Muslims as something so different, so other than the Dutch native woman. Following this, they need to be either excluded from society or liberated from their Islamic change, and introduced into the real, liberal Dutch society. Either stance is a clear form of Islamophobia, albeit they both express themselves differently. It is exactly this purposeful misrepresentation in the media along with the aforementioned underrepresentation of Muslims that has led to Islamophobia taking on a chronic and/or institutionalized form. It is up to the government to counter the misrepresentation of a significant part of its citizens by developing policies that lead to the correct representation of its Muslim citizens. One way of doing this, along with the aforementioned policy recommendation is by introducing new regulations for the way Muslims, and Muslim women in particular, are represented in the media, on the news, and in newspapers, and not showing them as faceless ghosts wallowing around from one place to another. They should be presented as the active and participating citizens that they truly are.

Lastly, in order for the aforementioned policies to have any effect, the government needs to rethink and readdress this new concept of “Wutbürger” coined by the NCTV. Pretty much all the attacks on Muslims and mosques by native Dutch citizens are not referred to as terrorist attacks inspired by an ideology that spans time and space, but as a sudden act by a “lone wolf” or, as NCTV now seems to prefer to call them, a “Wutbürger.” Meaning angry citizen, this type of person does not act out of clear, far-right extremist ideology, but more as the result of aggravations with society and politics stemming from a mixture of personal grief and psychological problems. This type of perpetrator is, then, often triggered into action under the influence of the internet with its radicalizing forums. The double standard here is particularly shocking, especially when one considers that the government does not seem able to spot it itself and at the same time, it wonders why there is so much polarization and a lack of faith in governmental institutions by Muslims. Even throughout this research, many events were presented in which Muslims where the victims and the perpetrators were native Dutch. More often than not, somehow the perpetrator was considered to be “not normal”, “suffering from psychoses”, in need of “guidance and help”, etc. The statements claim that their acts were, in fact, not directed towards Muslims, but the world in general as a result of severe dismay. One cannot but wonder why Muslim Dutch citizens, especially the ones who have been in the Netherlands for several generations, are not treated with the same understanding, leniency, and outstretched hand extended to the native Dutch. When someone with a Muslim background commits an act of violence, always a connection of some kind is made to radical groups that the perpetrator once in their lifetime might have visited online, a sermon made by a sheikh that may or may not possibly have ties to a group considered to be anti-Western, etc. One does not ever bother to consider the fact that this Muslim perpetrator is as much dismayed as the non-Muslim one, that their acts might also be a result of desperation and malcontent stemming from the current political landscape, perhaps a result of all the discrimination and its effects on Muslims seen throughout this report and supported by other research on discrimination, maybe a result of being under- or misrepresented in Dutch society and having no faith in governmental institutions. In order to stop polarization and chronic Islamophobia, the government needs to understand that Muslim Dutch citizens are as much deserving of the government’s help as anybody else, and that those who commit a crime, more often than not, are a “Wutbürger” as well, turning to violent measures as a result of sheer desperation and psychological issues stemming forth from constant discrimination and otherization. In order to do so, the government has to apply the previous recommendations, and finally start to view Muslims as real Dutch citizens.

Chronology

- 20.01.2020: The court in Amsterdam ruled that there were not sufficient reasons to justify Minister for Primary and Secondary Education and Media Arie Slob’s actions towards the Cornelius Haga Lyceum e.g., cutting off of subsidies, intervening in the school’s leadership, etc.
- 22.03.2020: Posters of protest were placed on the doors and windows of the Al-Himmah Mosque in Poelenberg, a neighborhood in Zaandan. The posters showed a mosque with a red ban sign over it and the text “No mosque.”
- 02.04.2020: The Social and Cultural Planning Bureau (SCP) published the second report of their research on discrimination in the Netherlands stating that people with a migration background (especially Turkish and Moroccan) and Muslims experience relatively high levels of discrimination, and that they feel strongly stigmatized, discriminated, and excluded. The latter affect the victims to the extent of them retreating from society, losing their faith in institutions, or simply giving up when it comes to education or finding a job.

- 26.05.2020: The Utrecht branch of the PVV called on people to protest against the call for prayer being magnified by loudspeakers. The party launched a website where residents of Utrecht can object to the call for prayer by the local mosques.

- 09.07.2020: Deradicalization expert Saadia Ait-Taleb of the municipality of Amsterdam was cleared of both the accusations of fraud and of having an inappropriate relationship with a contractor in 2016. The role of the Bureau of Integrity is now under investigation alongside the role played by institutional racism in the incident.

- 04.09.2020: The court decided that Geert Wilders was guilty of insulting Moroccans as a group during an election night on March 19, 2014. According to the court, Wilders consciously uttered the infamous words in front of a camera.

- 21.09.2020: A report was published by Meld Islamofobie on the effects of the burqa ban that started being implemented in August 2019. It stated that the ban is mainly used as an excuse to exclude, discriminate, and verbally and physically attack women with a facial veil and non-covered Muslim women.

- October 2020: A new report entitled “Muslima – A Research on the Representation of Muslimas in the Photo Database of the ANP” was released by the Muslima organization S.P.E.A.K. It concluded that the database’s pictures give a monotone impression of Muslimas regarding all facets of life: most are covered, and do not appear as active citizens who participate in society nor as individuals with their own social environment.

- 10.11.2020: A brick was thrown at a window of the Osmanlı Mosque in Zaandam.

- 13.12.2020: Swastikas were painted on the door and the wall of the Ulu Mosque in Utrecht. This was the third time the same perpetrator attacked the mosque.

Executive Summary

The reporting year was very difficult in all segments of social life. The assembly was dissolved, calling for new parliamentary elections. A technical government was formed, which by law has the obligation to create democratic processes for announcing the elections. But due to the declaration of the Covid-19 pandemic, the elections were delayed. The pandemic affected overall developments in North Macedonia.

The Islamic Religious Community (IRC) initially showed great awareness of the situation and immediately closed the mosques. However, due to the internal problems of this institution, the statements made by the Reis-ul-ulema Sulejman Rexhepi, regarding the coronavirus, caused a critical and disparaging attitude towards this institution and towards Islam generally among the population. The IRC dismissed its president Sulejman Rexhepi in the middle of 2020.

The election campaign in North Macedonia lasted a long time, and took place under special conditions due to the pandemic. Hate speech that is characteristic of every election in our country, this year was most present in the new political party LEVICA, which in their first parliamentary elections included announcements of religious restrictions. The verbal attack on Islam and Muslim activists was part of their election campaign.

Terrorist attacks in Europe have had a major impact on the spread of Islamophobia in North Macedonia. The topic of terrorism was intensified after the attack in Vienna, because the terrorist had Austrian and North Macedonian citizenship.

Pandemics, terrorism, political crisis, economic crisis, closed educational institutions, closed borders - all together these brought to the surface all the hatred, polarization, and intolerance that is present in society.
Извршно резиме

Репортираната година беше навистина тешка во сите сегменти на општествениот живот. Собранието се распуши и Владата поднесе оставка, со распишаа нови парламентарни избори на почетокот на годината. Беше формирана техничка влада која согласно законот има обврска да создава демократски процеси за распишување на изборите. Но, поради прогласувањето на пандемијата со Ковид 19 изборите беа пролонгирани. Пандемијата влијае во целокупните случувања во нашата држава.

Исламската Верска Заедница на почетокот покажа голема свесност за состојбата и веднаш ги затвори џамиите. Но, поради внатрешните проблеми на оваа институција, и изјавите кои ги даваше реисот Сулејман Реџепи поврзани со ковидот, кај населението предизвикуваа критички и омаловажувачки однос кон оваа институција и кон исламот. ИВЗ го разреши реисот на средината на оваа година.

Изборната кампанија траеше долго и во посебни услови. Говорот на омраза кој е својствен за секои избори, оваа година беше најприсутен кај новата политичка партија Левица која за прв пат дури и во својата изборна платформа содржеше најави за верски ограничувања. Вербалниот напад врз исламот и муслиманските активисти, беше дел од нивната изборна кампанија.

Терористичките напади во Европа имаа големо влијание во ширењето на исламофобијата и во Македонија. Темата тероризам посилно беше акутализирана по нападите во Виена, каде еден од напаѓачите имаше и македонско државјанство.

Пандемија, тероризам, политичка криза, економска криза, затворени образовни институции, затворени граници и тоа како ги извади на површина сета омраза и нетолеранција која владее во општеството.

Introduction

The fertile ground of the North Macedonian society for polarization on several grounds seems to have come to light again. In light of such social susceptibility to divisions, the coronavirus was put into operation. The daily increase in the number of newly infected people after the easing of the measures to prevent the spread of the pandemic seems to recycle the increasingly awakened stereotypes that seek to divide the population, both in the party-political plan and in the ethnic-religious sense. Also, the parliamentary elections that took place in 2020 reinforced the basis of polarization in society. In these elections, the coalition Možeme, won again, led by the Social Democratic Union of Macedonia (Социјал демократски сојуз на Македонија), which for the first time in the history of the parliamentary system ran in the elections together with the ethnic Albanian party BESA. The election was marred by hate speech, which state institutions have never sanctioned. However, the level of hate speech that was manifested by the president of the party LEVICA (The Left), Dimitar Apasiev, reached such a level that several criminal charges both by NGOs and the Ministry of Interior were initiated against him. For the first time this year, a procedure for hate speech against Muslims was initiated before the judicial authorities – and specifically against the prementioned Apasiev.

For a society to be able to eradicate Islamophobia and all the other forms of discrimination, it must first eliminate these phenomena from educational institutions. The books in primary and secondary education are permeated with lessons that create prejudices and stereotypes towards Muslims. However, the effort of the Faculty of Philosophy at the state university of North Macedonia to introduce the subject of Islamophobia in its teaching material is very important - although one part of the curriculum is aimed at strengthening Islamophobia in society rather than eliminating it.

Terrorism is a topic that has never ceased to be outside the interests of the media and the public. This year, North Macedonia is in the public spotlight in relation to terrorist attacks that took place in Europe. The trial for the terrorist attack that took place in Germany has revealed the identity of one of the suspects, a Macedonian citizen, Filan Mitrev, a convert to Islam. This news caused mixed feelings in North Macedonia, especially the suspect’s radicalization which became evident only after his conversion to Islam, even though he already had a criminal record. The news about Filan was still current in our society, when the terrorist attack in Vienna took place and the perpetrator had a dual Austrian and North Macedonian citizenship.

The current report is based on extensive research on reported cases and incidents related to Islamophobia and particularly the reports of the Office of the Ombudsman, media reports, contacts with NGOs and their reports, discussions with religious institutions, organizations and individuals that have helped in finding cases with subtle nuances of discrimination based on religious belief. Information has been gathered in the local languages\(^1\) spoken by the Muslim communities in the country.

Physical and Verbal Attacks

In the city of Bitola, two newly reconstructed mosques, Haidar Kadi and Ishak Mosques were covered in graffiti with the same message. The message was “Hagia Sophia was and will remain a church.” This was a reaction to the news from Istanbul regarding Hagia Sophia. The case was reported to the police by the mufti in Bitola.\(^2\) In relation to the news of Hagia Sophia being proclaimed a mosque, the media in Macedonia shared the message of the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople Bartholomew who stated, “The Christians will turn against Islam if Hagia Sophia becomes a mosque.” \(^3\)

There is no official proceeding before relevant institution/s and/or basic courts regarding discrimination against Muslims on a religious basis in the country. A recent job interview of a Muslim woman wearing a hijab was presented to the author as a case of discrimination. The applicant was called for a job interview in one of the biggest telecommunication companies in Macedonia to be informed that she is not a good candidate for the job due to the company’s summer uniforms having short sleeves. The applicant responded that she is willing to wear the winter or long sleeve uniform in the summer period and asked for a written response to the reason for rejection of her application. She asked if there is an internal manual that includes a summer and winter uniform sleeve rule. She was denied any such documents by the company. However, the Muslim woman didn’t want to start a legal procedure against the company or report the case to local human rights organizations that litigate discrimination cases.

Education

At the Faculty of Philosophy of the state-owned Saints Cyril and Methodius University, Skopje as part of the program International and Intercultural Studies, the subject “Islamophobia and Otherness” is offered. The description of the subject’s curriculum states the following: Definition of Islamophobia; Roots of Islamophobia; Reasons for the Emergence and Intensification of Islamophobia in the Modern World; Islamic Fundamentalism and Jihad; Conceptual Definition of Fundamentalism; The Place and Role of Holy War in the Ideology of Islamic Fundamentalism; The Holy War against Christians and Jews, New Tendencies in Islamic Fundamentalist Movement, Perspectives of the Islamic Fundamentalism; Al-Qaeda Roots; Jihad in Contemporary International Relations; Islamization as a Factor of Albanisation of the Western Balkan Region; European Islam or Islamic Europe; The Renaissance of the Idea of Jihad in the Unique State for All Albanian Population; The Global Jihad and the World Islamic League; Global Jihad and the Islamic Council; Joint Action of Islamic Organizations in Preparation for Jihad; Neo-ecumenism versus Pan-Islamism; The Influence of Religion on the Unification of the Old Continent; the Arabization of Non-Arab Muslims and the Anthropological Change of the Arabs; The impact of Modern Turkey on Reducing Islamophobia in Europe; Islamophobia and Democratization of the Countries in the Western Balkans Region.

If we take a closer look at the curriculum on the subject of Islamophobia, we will see literature that supports misleading narratives and encourages students to support such ideologies, instead of a list of scholars that understand and try to combat Islamophobia. This is especially true of the recommended literature such as the books of Miroljub Jevtic.

In the national reports on Bosnia and Herzegovina and Serbia in European Islamophobia Report 2019, Professor Miroljub Jevtic is one of the central figures who contribute to the spread of Islamophobia in these two countries. Studying his books at the University of North Macedonia contributes to the spread of fake perceptions of Islam and encourages Islamophobia among academics and students.

At the Faculty of Security at St. Kliment Ohridski University in Skopje an academic paper was published entitled “Modern Forms of Terrorism-Foreign Fighters from the Western Balkans.” The paper was filled with false information, yet was published under the mentorship of Prof. Dr. Zlate Dimkovski, who specializes in the field of international terrorism.

The Ministry of Education and Science has developed a strategy for removing content that encourages religious and ethnic intolerance from the curriculum at all the levels of education. However, there is still a primary school named “Njegosh,” after the Montenegrin bishop and ruler, Petar Petrovich Njegosh, the poems and literary works are full of hate speech against Muslims in the Balkans. A lot of scientific works have been written in the region about how his works served to encourage the genocide that took place against Muslims in the Balkans. Also, the book Mountain Wreath that consist poems in which he addresses Muslims with derogatory names is still read in secondary education.

8. EIR 2019, chapter Bosnia and Hercegovina: “The central figures in spreading Islamophobia in B&H can be divided into three categories. First, the academic and semi-academic circles in Serbia and Republika Srpska, most notably Serbian “experts” on security, terrorism, and Islam such as Predrag Ceranić, Miroljub Jevtić, Dževad Gali-jarević, and Darko Trifunović. Second, several high-ranking officials from the Serb Orthodox Church such as Bishops Amfilohije and Patriarch Irinej.”

Politics

The Assembly of North Macedonia voted for the early parliamentary election of late January, 2020 to be held in April 2020. The political party LEVICA, formed in 2016, appeared in this election with far-right rhetoric. In their election program, they promised to propose taxes for religious groups, a secular state with “no religious fanatics,” and to reduce the volume of religious temples. (Fig. 3)

There were other election pamphlets by LEVICA, in which reads:

The president of the party Dimitar Apasiev made a guest appearance on the show “Only Truth,” broadcasted on a national TV station and said, “So, what is the problem with us? See the whole country is Islamized, the imams sing like in an Islamic republic. Do you not see the Islamization that is happening from Bit Pazar (Old town) onwards, do you not see radical Islam entering here, Wahhabism? Macedonian students brought back from Saudi Arabia by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, are studying radical Islam there!"

The author of the current report published a statement on her Facebook account accusing Apasiev of spreading Islamophobia.16 The post attracted a great deal of attention on social media. A few days later, Apasiev posted the following political post on his Facebook profile, during the election campaign:

Greetings to my colleague, anti-Semite, Mujahedeen, Mersiha Smailovikj, from SDS-patriarchal-party.

He went on to share the poster of the party election propaganda and to state, “I am voting for a secular Macedonia, without religious fanatics.”

As a result of this post, the local branch of the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights filed criminal charges against Apasiev.18

On the occasion of Teacher’s Day, March 8, MP Arta Toci wrote a post on her Facebook profile, thanking teachers for their work by stating, “Great respect for your mission to eradicate illiteracy and remove the headscarf on Albanian girls.” The post caused a great reaction on social networks, especially since in the past, in certain places in the Balkans, our grandmothers and mothers were forced to remove their headscarves if they wanted to attend primary school. After the public reaction, Toci deleted the post.

Figure 7: “Love and devotion to teachers who with their behavior and enthusiasm at work created the model to be followed. How they made the language the standard of communication, for the pronunciation of each Albanian letter in relation to the roots. Much respect for their mission to eradicate illiteracy and remove the hijab among Albanian women.” Personal Facebook profile of MP Arta Toci, at 8-of March, 2020.

The leader of the Democratic Party of Albanians, Menduh Thaci, directly blamed Muslims for the growing number of people infected with the Covid-19 virus. “I think the irresponsibility of Bujar Osmani and the current Islamic religious community put public pressure to open the mosques for the Ramadan Bairam holiday. They are the main culprits for this situation.”

Media

The celebration of the month of Ramadan during the Covid-19 pandemic was the most abused media topic in so far as the customs practiced this month were presented as the main reasons for the spread of the virus. Over five media outlets reported fake news that the residents of certain municipalities in North Macedonia are banned from entering Greece with the headline, “Greece Bans Entry for the Municipalities from Macedonia with the Most Infected - Among Them Tetovo and Čair.”20 Municipalities with a predominantly Muslim population were targeted. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs announced that this was fake news, after which certain media only withdrew the news, without apologizing for the damage they had caused.

With the daily spread of the virus and the restrictive measures taken by the authorities, citizens spent a lot of time on social networks arguing over who is to blame for the spread. Due to the publication of the numbers of those infected by the municipalities, it was easy to acquire a picture of the ethnic and religious affiliation of most of those infected with the virus. However, reports in the print media that focused on negative news about non-compliance with measures, quarantine, etc. often opted for images dominated by Islamic symbols.

Figure 8: “Those Fleeing Isolation Decisions Have Now “Burned” out Inspectors’ Phones.” The criminal act as fleeing from isolation, has been it is forwarded with photographs on which is the Stone bridge, a legacy from the Ottoman period and has women with a headscarf, which leads the reader to say that those fleeing isolation are Muslims.22

Figure 10: “The Borders Open on Friday, June 26, The Airports on July 1, Next Wednesday, Without Any Restrictions.”23

The news that the borders are opening without restrictions has provoked a negative reaction among the people. And the picture of a Muslim family tells readers that Muslims will be the only ones to enter Macedonia without restrictions.

The news about the arrested terrorist in Germany of Macedonian origin, Filan Mitrev, son of a renowned cardiologist, received a lot of attention in the North Macedonian media. One of the newspapers carried the headline, “Naive Salafist Rejects Comfortable Life Because of Terrorism.” Further in the text, it writes, “The Salafism he embraced was an ultra-conservative movement within Sunni Islam that emerged in the second half of the 19th century. His doctrine is considered a fundamentalist approach to Islam. ‘Love of God’ remained with him after his release in April last year, but he also developed hatred for the West.” The debate went on due to his famous father, the surgeon Zhan Mitrev, who owns one of the biggest private hospitals in the country.

The terrorist attack in the city of Vienna hit the headlines in the media in North Macedonia due to the Macedonian origin of the acclaimed terrorist, Kujtim Fejzulahu.

Ljubco Zlate, the editor of the web portal Leader, wrote on his Facebook page,

One of the terrorists who attacked Vienna yesterday is of Macedonian origin. Do you know what is one of the reasons France is questioning our EU membership? One of the reasons is that the country does not have any strategy to deal with Islamic extremism and has long been an exporter of Islamic terrorists. Here I will mention the hundreds of ISIS fighters who come from here, but also the son of a famous doctor. This is not the only case.

This terrorist attack caused a great surge of Islamophobia in North Macedonia. The media used terms such as “Islamist terrorism”, “Islamist”, “Islamic extremism”, “Islamic fanaticism”, “Islamic fascism”, and “Muslim terrorist.” They didn’t refer to a as terrorist /terrorist attack, but Islam was constantly added as the cause behind his actions.

Most media outlets linked his identity and radicalism to the Balkans. In the national newspaper Nova Makedonija, the headline read, “Vienna Attack a Harbinger of New Terrorist Wave in Europe?”

The article stated, “The family of Kujtim Fejzulai, a 20-year-old jihadist who was killed by police after his rampage through the Austrian capital, lived in a house behind a rusty green gate in a village with several mosques before moving to Austria in 2000.29

On the web portal Tocka, the following was written about the terrorist act in Vienna: “... the young man, originally from North Macedonia, was raised according to the Islamic faith and became a Salafist-jihadist supporter of political Takfirism.”30

The TV show “What’s Not Clear” dedicated an episode to the attack in Vienna, using the term “radical Islamist sect.” It was stated that these terrorists “hate liberal societies and aim to destroy these societies.” Particularly worrying were the statements that there are training centers in Macedonia, where terrorist attacks are being prepared.31

The new law on the protection and prevention against discrimination came into force in 2020. The law governs only general matters (lex generalis); in other words, it does not regulate in detail every area to which it refers. The new law includes general provisions, which are regulated in more detail in specific laws.32

The law prohibits any discrimination based on race, skin color, national origin or ethnicity, sex, gender, sexual orientation, gender identity, marginalized group, language, citizenship, social origin, education, religion or belief, political belief, other belief, disability, age, or marital status, property status, health status, personal status and social status, or any other basis.

The law envisages the establishment of a special commission that will have competencies on the prevention of discrimination and will be able to initiate procedures for the protection against discrimination ex officio, as well as numerous other competencies.33

Civil activist Jasmin Redjepi, after 10 years of participating in the International Humanitarian Flotilla for Gaza, also known as Mavi Marmara, was attacked by a prominent Islamophobe, Ljupce Zlatev, in a special video edition in which he said, “Jasmin Redjepi, the husband of Mersiha Smailovikj, in June 2010 was deported from Israel to Macedonia because he was found on the ship ‘Mavi Marmara’ who wanted to attack Israel. He was found on the ship together with two other Macedonian citizens, Sali Emin and Sead Asipi. Mersiha’s husband, along with his companions, clashed with Israeli soldiers trying to stop this terrorist ship from attacking Israel. There are recordings of this.”34 Jasmin Redjepi is a well-known activist in North Macedonia and has initiated a defamation lawsuit against Zlatev.35

On March 17, the IRC decided to ban the Jumah prayers and other group prayers in mosques in order to prevent the spread of the virus.36

Emergency was declared across the country which brought with it restrictions on movement and closures across the entire country. The Islamic Community issued a statement in early April announcing the complete closure of mosques as a measure to prevent the spread of Covid-19, a move of special significance given the approach of Ramadan.

The controversial journalist Zoran Bozinovski, who has 21,603 followers online, on one of his Facebook profiles, used the trend of news related to religious holidays and the pandemic to publish several manipulative posts. On April 16, he first published a post with a spectacular headline: “Atomic Test in Kumanovo.”

Imam Sadula Bajrami sent an official disclaimer, where he stated, “I emphasize that this news is DEFAMATION and that it is completely piled up by fake sources. I categorically deny and also declare with full responsibility that such an event did not happen, that it is so-called slander and that our appeals to the believers who follow us have always been in full compliance with the recommendations of the institutions.”

The first day of the opening of the mosques was for Eid al-Fitr. Due to the proclaimed State of Emergency, the weekends for Easter and other holidays were under total lockdown. However, the government decided for the day of Eid that the lockdown would start at 11:00 a.m., and the IRC called the public to an Eid Prayer, following all the protocols. This decision caused a great reaction in society and above all on social media. The announcement of a lockdown led to polarization among the citizens; pictures of crowded mosques were shared on social media, instigating hate speech.

The twitter profile Efo, at May 24, at the night of Easter, he placed a picture of an empty church and on the other side a picture of a mosque, whose courtyard is full of believers. Wanting to show how the state banned gatherings for Easter and allowed the same for Eid.

Figure 13: “For Easter empty churches and 3 days lockdown, for Ramadan full mosques, lockdown lifted from the request of the coalition partners, Filipche (Minister of Health) tonight on press conference will speak again about how well he dances with corona.”

On the day of Ramadan for the Eid prayer, there was high presence of media outlets, where the Imam Sulejman Rexhepi made the following statement: “We expect in the period to come to beat the bad and all of you should know that from today on I proclaim Covid-19 dead, given that we beat him and that’s why we are present here.”

This statement continues to this day to be used as a parody on social media - a satirical Facebook page was opened, “Reis-ul-ulema Sulejman Rexhepi’s Fan Club.”

On May 27, the head of the IRC, Sulejman Rexhepi, was dismissed, following numerous scandals related to his 20 years of running this institution.

Professor and academic Katica Kulavkova wrote on Twitter, “We pay the price of coexistence with our lives.”

This tweet came after the publication of the numbers of the newly infected which showed that areas predominantly populated by Muslims had higher numbers. Kulavkova implied that the reason for the spread of the virus is interethnic relations, not the widespread non-compliance with the measures. The Helsinki Committee for Human Rights filed a complaint with the Public Prosecutor’s Office against Kulavkova for the statement that encourages intolerance between ethnic communities.49

On the day of the terrorist attack in Vienna, the former Minister of Justice and professor at the Faculty of Law Renata Deskovska expressed her condolences to the victims by stating: “Therefore, terrorism is not a crime against individuals or property. It is a crime against our values, using the death of innocent people and the destruction of property to intimidate us... And when we react out of fear, when we change our habits, our policies, terrorists succeed - even if their attacks fail.” University Professor at Faculty of Law, Karolina Ristova Asterud commented, “Well, this terrorism has a name - ISLAMIC - (and that is a euphemism, it should be - Islamo-fascist).”50

Figure 16: “Therefore, terrorism is not a crime against individuals or property. It is a crime against our values, using the death of innocent people and the destruction of property to intimidate us... Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

The continuity of hate speech steadily increased in 2020, partly due to the Covid-19 pandemic and partly due to hate speech caused by parliamentary elections. In order to flatter the voters, the new political party LEVICA focused on restoring the country’s old name, attracting a large number of nationalists as supporters. Regarding Islamophobia, the party president Dimitar Apasiev had made statements in the past that were Islamophobic. This year, in his public appearances he continued to insult Islam and Muslims, and included this rhetoric in his party’s election campaign and program. After it became public that the Helsinki Committee had filed criminal charges against Apasiev, for his hate speech against Muslims, LEVICA shared the news on its Facebook page where comments of support and Islamophobia abounded.

Figure 17: Today the president of the LEVICA - Prof. Dr. Dimitar Apasiev was summoned to testify before the Public Prosecutor’s Office, after criminal charges were filed against him for hate speech by the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights, Tanja Milevska and Mersiha Smailovikj. In his statement, he emphasized that it is a matter of political pressure from structures close to the government at a time when LEVICA is factoring in the political scene. Apasiev announced that in the coming period criminal charges will be filed for endangering security due to received threats, and the Prosecution is expected to act promptly. Although the president of LEVICA is entitled to parliamentary immunity, Apasiev decided not to use it and gave a statement to the Public Prosecutor’s Office.52

This news caused huge discussions on social networks, and Apasiev’s supporters commented on almost every post. Given the fact that the author of this report, who filed the complaint against Apasiev, has been active in public life for a long time and constantly speaks about Islamophobia in society, it is the first time that the reaction from critics was so strong and full of Islamophobia.

Supporters of Apasiev even made posters mocking Islam and Muslims. This posters for published on several FB profiles, whose owners erased them occasionally and reposted them again after several days.

Several criminal charges were filed against Apasiev in 2020, namely by Mersiha Smailovikj Tanja Milevska (journalist), and the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights. There was also a report on a crime committed by Apasiev, from the Ministry of Interior, which, according to the ministry refers to two Facebook statuses and one tweet. Until the end of this year, the Public Prosecutor office didn’t file charges against him nor did it dismiss the lawsuits. However, four months after the present author accused him of Islamophobia on her Facebook profile, Apasiev filed charges against Smailovikj and six others who are unknown to both Smailovickj and the Ministry of the Interior.

Apasiev is a member of the Macedonian Assembly. His style of speaking is the same at the parliamentary rostrum, the same he has been practicing for years in his public appearances – it is violent. It becomes a paradigm for violence that is a dominant feature of our society, in its various forms. Its popularity is growing and the number of his supporters is constantly increasing.

Despite the numerous Islamophobic instances and intolerance that our society experienced in 2020, Muslim organizations remained indifferent to eradicating this phenomenon. They did not come out with declarations condemning Islamophobic speech nor did they develop strategies on how to combat it as a society. However, several initiatives and processes were initiated in 2020, and were outstanding in combating fake news, prejudice, and Islamophobia.

The OSCE Mission to Macedonia has launched a project called “Loud against Rumors,” which fights against prejudices imposed by society on Muslim women by focusing on examples of Muslim women in Macedonia. Personal instances of specific prejudices faced by Muslim women are highlighted in short publications.

The Commission for Relations with Religious Communities and Religious Groups is a state institution, which this year published the book “A Guide to Islam.”

One of the organizations that work very well in the fight against fake news is the organisation Nexus Civil Concept, from Skopje, North Macedonia. In weekly and monthly reports, the organization addresses fake news related, among others, to Muslims. The reports highlight Islamophobia in the media, the Internet, and in the speeches of politicians. The reports are published on their website.

The Helsinki Committee for Human Rights of the Republic of North Macedonia is an organization whose core work regards human rights. It raises its voice when there is an incident that has Islamophobic elements. The organization is also contacted by Muslims who feel that they need to report an incident.60

The NGO Legis organizes training for young people in several cities across North Macedonia. The training covers discrimination, Islamophobia, and xenophobia as phenomena in our society and encourages young people to fight against all forms of discrimination through various online campaigns.

The NGO Civil, as an advocate of free speech and fighting discrimination, has proved to be a platform in the last years that has been active in calling out cases that contributed to inciting Islamophobia, especially in the context of the media.

Webpages such as orient.mk and religija.mk publish religious articles in the Macedonian language and are accessible platforms for writing articles about Islam and Islamophobia. Orient.mk writes specifically about various forms of Islamophobia in our society.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Islamophobia is a phenomenon that must be constantly monitored and documented. It is necessary to develop an overall strategy for its eradication in countries that are multireligious. Failure to report Islamophobia and impunity for instigators of Islamophobia has been a long-standing problem. Of particular concern are the growing emergence of Islamophobia, on the one hand, and the silence of the relevant Muslim institutions and Muslim organizations, on the other. In order to fight Islamophobic incidents in the country, the following policies are recommended:

− Islamophobia should be recognized as a part of hate speech and hate crime in national legislation.
− A record of cases and incidents related directly to Islamophobia should regularly be updated and published by the Ministry of Interior and other relevant institutions.
− The Ministry of Education should remove all material that causes Islamophobia and prejudice from educational material.
− Islamophobic statements on social media should be criminally charged and fined, but also automatically deleted from the Internet by the Ministry of Interior.

− The office of the Ombudsman should work more extensively in encouraging members of the Muslim community in North Macedonia to report cases of Islamophobia.
− Training of the media and journalists on Islam should be organized. A guidebook for reporters on how to report on Islam and to educate them on Islam should be written.
− In the hate speech training curriculum, Islamophobia should be included as a separate chapter.
− Reporting platforms created by NGOs should make Islamophobia a specific category within the reporting options.
− Muslim NGOs should make an effort to fight this phenomenon and focus their work on educating Muslim youth and the Muslim community on the exact characteristics of Islamophobia and how to detect it. They should create an accessible platform for reporting it.
− Muslim NGOs should build a coalition against Islamophobia and publish joint announcements where hate speech is condemned.
− The Islamic Community of North Macedonia should take more initiatives for the rights of the Muslims, and in creating channels and platforms for the detection of Islamophobia.

Executive Summary

Fearmongering, lack of systemic education, and hateful media campaigns and news are the main reasons why Polish people are prejudiced against Islam. The growing problem of threats, insecurity, and instability for Muslims living in Poland finds no specific answer from the Polish government. The systematic work of the Polish Ombudsman’s Office and other institutions like the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) shows that there is a growing problem of underreported hate crimes; only a margin of the crimes committed is reported to the police.

The coronavirus pandemic did not improve the difficult situation of Polish Muslims, but rather - just like in other parts of the world - intensified the inequality and persecution of minorities. People who experienced exclusion on various levels on a daily basis were particularly vulnerable to the effects of health and safety restrictions. This group consisted mostly of migrants, refugees, and people applying for international protection in Poland - many of whom were Muslims. The government, which is dealing with the pandemic and the police, which is dealing with the results of the coronavirus, are not interested in protecting Polish Muslims or actively reacting to the problem of the worsening situation of minorities in Poland.

The presidential election campaign conducted in the first six months of 2020 was also an occasion for politicians to make Islamophobic statements. Though rarer than in previous years, it still shows that fearmongering against the Muslim community continues to gain political attention. That is why the government media like TVP and other right-wing media still publish a lot of news showing Islam and its followers in a one-sided, negative manner.

There were just a small number of positive initiatives by few activists and NGOs to counter the widespread Islamophobia. However, spreading stereotypes and false, negative information is a process and as a result, without systematic work, without changing the political and media language and the school curricula, the black-and-white, prejudiced view of Muslims in Polish society will not change.
Streszczenie

Podżeganie do strachu, brak systemowej edukacji, a także pełne nienawiści kampań medialne i informacje to główne powody, dla których tak wielu Polaków jest uprzedzonych co do islamu. Narastający problem zagrożeń, sytuacja niepewności i niestabilność muzułmanów mieszkających w Polsce nie znajduje konkretnej odpowiedzi ze strony polskiego rządu, który ignoruje ten problem, nie uznając, że istnieje on naprawdę. Systematyczna praca Biura Rzecznika Praw Obywatelskich oraz innych instytucji i organizacji, takich jak Organizacja Bezpieczeństwa i Współpracy w Europie (OBWE), pokazuje, że narasta problem braku zgłaszania przestępstw z nienawiści - na policję zgłaszany jest jedynie margines rzeczywistych przestępstw.

Pandemia koronawirusa nie poprawiła trudnej sytuacji polskich muzułmanów, ale raczej - podobnie jak w różnych częściach świata - pogłębiła problem nierówności i prześladowań mniejszości. Osoby, które na co dzień doświadczają wykluczenia na różnych płaszczyznach, są szczególnie narażone na skutki wprowadzanych w związku z pandemią ograniczeń. Tą grupą są migranci i migrantki, uchodźcy i uchodźczynie oraz osoby ubiegające się o ochronę międzynarodową, szukające w Polsce schronienia - często są to muzułmanie. Rząd zajmujący się pandemią i policja zajmująca się jej skutkami nie są zainteresowane ochroną polskich muzułmanów, ani aktywnym reagowaniem na problem gorszej sytuacji mniejszości mieszkających w Polsce.

Kampania prezydencka przeprowadzona w I półroczu 2020 roku była także okazją do wypowiedzenia się przez polityków w sposób islamofobiczny. Choć tego typu wypowiedzi były zdecydowanie rzadsze niż w poprzednich latach, to pokazują, że podsycanie strachu przed społecznością muzułmańską wciąż jest paliwem do zдобywania uwagi politycznej. Dlatego też media rządowe, takie jak TVP i inne media prawicowe, wciąż publikują wiele informacji ukazujących islam i jego wyznawców w jednostronny, negatywny sposób.

Niewiele działaczy i organizacji pozarządowych podjęło tylko kilka pozytywnych inicjatyw, które miały przeciwdziałać szerzącej się islamofobii. Proces szerzenia się stereotypów i fałszywych, negatywnych informacji jest jednak procesem i dlatego bez systematycznej pracy, zmiany języka politycznego i medialnego oraz programu nauczenia nie zmieni się czarno-biały pogląd pełen uprzedzeń względem muzułmanów w polskim społeczeństwie.
Country Profile
EIR 2020

Country: Poland
Type of Regime: Democratic Republic
Form of Government: Semi-presidential Ruling Parties: PiS – Law and Justice (right-wing, national-conservative, Christian democratic) Opposition Parties: PO – Civic Platform (centre-right)
Total Population: 37.97 million (2019)
Major Languages: Polish
Official Religion: No official religion (secularism)
Statistics on Islamophobia: According to official data of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Administration, 736 procedures in hate crimes cases were initiated by the police in 2020, 27 of which concerned hate crimes against Muslims. Data was made available after an e-mail inquiry to the Security Department of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Administration. According to this data, the number of hate crimes is decreasing: in 2019, there were 972 procedures about hate crimes initiated and 33 of these concerned Muslims. In 2018, there were 1,124 procedures, of which 62 concerned Muslims. The police data speaks of 44 crimes committed based on the target’s ethnicity that might be linked to Islam (Arabs, Bengalis, Turks, etc.).
Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: For the first 10 months of 2020, the official police statistics provide the figure of 665 hate crimes of which 577 were based on national, ethnic, and racial affiliation of the victim or the victim’s political, religious, or non-denominational status. However, recent research conducted by the Office of the Ombudsman indicates that hate crime is severely underreported and, in specific, that among people from Muslim-majority and sub-Saharan African countries only 5% of racist incidents are reported.
Major Religions (% of Population): Christianity (93.2%), Non-believers (3.1%), Jehovah’s Witnesses (0.2%), Other (0.2%) (data for 2018 based on information from the Main Office for Statistics; GUS 2018).
Muslim Population (% of Population): Depending on sources, between 10,000 and 30,000 (around 0.05%).
Main Muslim Community Organizations: The Muslim Religious Association (Związek Muzułmanów Polskich) and the Muslim League in the Polish Republic (Liga Muzułmańska RP)

Main NGOs Combatting Islamophobia: The Polish Ombudsman’s Office, Never Again Association, Centre for Monitoring Racist and Xenophobic Behaviors, Hate Stop, Stefan Batory Foundation (Fundacja im. Stefana Batorego), Center for Research on Prejudice

Far-Right Parties: Confederation (Konfederacja), National Movement (Ruch Narodowy), National Revival of Poland (Narodowe Odrodzenie Polski)

Far-Right Movements: All-Polish Youth, National Radical Camp, Independence March Association

Introduction
The coronavirus pandemic dominated narratives in Polish society, politics, and media. Despite the pandemic, the growing Islamophobia, the lack of education about Islam, the Islamophobic utterances of Polish politicians, and the consolidation of stereotypes through fake news and the manipulation on the Internet and mainstream media did not stop. Almost all events perceived as negative in Poland in 2020 were marked with attempts to somehow associated them with Islam.

Right before the outbreak of the coronavirus, certain Polish politicians started the presidential elections campaign with Islamophobic statements. At the brink of the election campaign Krzysztof Bosak (MP and the far-right Konfederacja candidate in the 2020 presidential elections) tweeted that “Islam has nothing to do with freedom, therefore its development in Poland should be stopped.” A month before the planned date of the presidential elections in April, Zbigniew Ziobro (Minister of Justice, Prosecutor General, and a leader of Solidarna Polska party) tweeted that “Islam is alien to our culture” and suggested that Poland should defend itself against it. Using Muslims as scapegoats is still a present and quite popular strategy in specific political circles in Poland (cf. Politics section).

The change connected with the global pandemic affected members and leaders of the Catholic Church. Although the Catholic media - including leading media such as Gość Niedzielny or the Polish section of Vatican Radio - continue to lead the way in publishing Islamophobic content, when it comes to clergy and hierarchs, they are no longer as active in the field of fearmongering against Islam as they were in the previous years. The Day of Islam organized by the Catholic Church in Poland became an occasion for positive statements from several bishops (cf. Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia section). Preoccupied with the pedophilia scandal and media crisis connected to, the Church focused on attacking the LGBT+ community and the main figures of Catholic Islamophobia were not active this year (cf. Central Figures of Islamophobia section).

Polish authorities admit that according to the official data hundreds of hate crimes occurred in 2020, and the actual statistics for hate crimes may be as much as 20 times higher. The coronavirus pandemic intensified the inequality and persecution of minorities. People who experienced exclusion on various levels on a daily basis were particularly vulnerable to the effects of restrictions introduced in connection with the pandemic. This group consisted mostly of migrants, refugees, and people applying for international protection in Poland - many of whom were Muslims. According to the Polish Ombudsman’s Office, which is constantly ignored by the Polish government, the authorities focused on the pandemic and the anti-government women rights demonstrations, and were not interested. in protecting Muslims and other minorities.1 (cf. Physical and Verbal Attacks section)

As our Twitter research has shown, Polish media readers and social media users are still interested in propelling Islamophobic content. Especially during the period when there was increased interest in Muslim-majority countries (Iran in January 2020 or Hagia Sophia in summer 2020) and immediately after terrorist attacks (not necessarily committed in the name of Islam), the number of publications and discussion on Islam increases significantly. Polish Internet users - very often with little knowledge of Islam - write about Muslims mainly negatively (over 90 percent of the content), presenting the problems related to Islam in black and white. (cf. Internet) The presence of people with an Islamophobic attitude among TVP journalists and other mainstream media outlets is a big concern (cf. Media section)

However, it is worth mentioning that in 2020 journalists promoting reliable information about Muslim communities were more active. More and more books are being published both on Islam abroad and on the traditions of Polish Muslims living in the country from the Middle Ages. In 2020, a virtual iftar was organized gathering over 100 Polish Muslims and the right-wing weekly magazine Gazeta Polska was punished for its racist publication. Still, without systemic work, the prejudiced view of Muslims in Polish society will not change.2

Physical and Verbal Attacks

Research cited by the Office of the Ombudsman shows that only 5% of hate crimes against Ukrainians, and migrants from Muslim and sub-Saharan African countries were reported to the police.3 Consequently, the actual scale of hate crimes including verbal and physical attacks is greatly underestimated. Additionally, 18-23% of the victims of hate crimes show symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder while the average percentage of PTSD symptoms in the Polish population is 5%. According to official data of the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Administration, 557 procedures in hate crimes cases were initiated by the police in the first 11 months of 2020. Fourteen of them concerned hate crimes against Muslims. According to police sources, there were 665 hate crimes in the first 10 months of 2020, 577 of which were based on national, ethnic, and racial affiliation of the victim or the victim's political, religious, or non-denominational status, and 44 crimes were committed based on the target's ethnicity that might be linked to Islam (Arabs, Bengalis, Turks, etc.).

Incidents of hate speech and attacks documented by NGOs in 2020 include many cases of discrimination based on the assumption that Muslims and people of ethnicity that might be linked to Islam are spreading the coronavirus. Such incidents include the refusal of service and orders to leave stores or places of service provision to customers of Muslim faith or foreign ethnic origin under the unsubstantiated suspicions that they will infect the staff with the coronavirus. Similar statements directly declaring that Muslims and refugees are spreading the disease were presented by public figures on the state-owned television channel TVP and were published on Twitter by journalists cooperating with the station. These statements resulted in the spread of Islamophobic content and provoked comments inciting hatred, violence, and expressing sickness and death wishes toward Muslims. Racist and Islamophobic comments also appeared under the online appeal made by the mayor of Poznań, Jacek Jaśkowiak, to stop discriminating against foreigners and people of other faiths, and to stop blaming them for the spread of the coronavirus.

The Ministry of Interior Affairs sees no need to regulate the issue of hate speech as has been recommended by international bodies. Furthermore, the Ombudsman reminded Prime Minister Mateusz Morawiecki that over two years ago he signaled the need to create a comprehensive strategy to counteract hate crimes. Despite the 20 systemic recommendations for changes in law and practice published by the Ombudsman in 2019, nothing has changed.

Employment

Our group interviews with Muslims have showed that they are often discriminated against in their workplaces and are asked to conceal their religion because of employers’ fears of scaring off potential customers. Muslims experience Islamophobic jokes, gossip, are suspected of dishonesty, and are rejected by their co-workers who do not want to co-operate with them because of prejudices against Islam. Women are particularly vulnerable to discrimination in the workplace. In the group interviews, re-respondents stated that they experienced unequal treatment in relation to followers of other religions (e.g. wearing religious symbols of Christianity in the workplace was common despite top-down prohibitions, but wearing the hijab resulted in immediate orders to remove it), ridicule, public humiliation, and threats of dismissal due to covering their hair in the workplace. Chronic stress resulting from an atmosphere of prejudice caused by revealing their religious affiliation in some cases resulted in the interviewees quitting their work. A common strategy among Muslims in Poland is to hide their religious affiliation and avoid displaying symbols pertaining to Islam in their workplace.

The situation of foreign workers, including Muslims, became exceptionally difficult during the coronavirus pandemic. Refugees and migrants in need of appropriate work permits were often condemned to significantly extended waiting periods resulting in them not being able to get employment. In the face of the impending recession and taking advantage of the lack of knowledge of the labor law among migrants, employers reduced their salaries or, without prior warning, dismissed foreigners often employed illegally or on temporary contracts.

Additionally, Muslims may have encountered prejudices when trying to rent a flat. Cases of refusal to rent an apartment to a Muslim result from the belief that they do not keep their houses and themselves clean. Muslims may also have experienced a significant increase in their rents because of the belief that all Muslims in Poland are foreigners who do not know the rental market prices or Polish law.

Education

According to the primary and secondary public school curricula, topics concerning Islam are obligatory in history and religion classes. Education on Islam in history lessons boils down to a narrow introduction to the genesis of Islam, a basic characterization of its principles, and the introduction of early conquests and scientific discoveries. Outside of the Middle Ages, Islam is presented only in the context of conflicts between Muslim-majority and European states, and depicted as a foreign and distant cultural circle. Teachers who on their own initiative decide to take up topics such as Islam, religious diversity, the contemporary situation in the Middle East, or migrations, add them as a footnote to other subjects, as an extracurricular activity at the expense of their free time, without pay, and risking a conflict with the local Board of Education, the school principal, or the students’ parents. During primary and secondary education on religion - which for a vast majority of students is understood as the Catholic catechism - the topics related to non-Christian religions appear in one thematic block in secondary school. The curriculum specifies that in this block the cat-

The catechist is to present basic information on Judaism, Buddhism, Hinduism, and Islam, characteristics of religious sects, and the consequences of belonging to them. In this context, the catechist is also required to explain the concepts of religious fanaticism and religious indifference. The new core curriculum for teaching religion introduced in Poland on September 1, 2020, removed the obligation to teach the foundations of the most important non-Christian religions, instead emphasizing the uniqueness of Christianity over other religions and the paths of interreligious dialogue chosen by the Catholic Church. It is no longer required to teach the topics of religious fanaticism, but instead the curriculum mentions showing respect for other faiths.

The growing problem in the Polish system of education is the lack of adequate support for the children of foreign and mixed backgrounds, and their parents. Children of migrants or of mixed origin, children of color, and children of the Muslim faith might have encountered high levels of prejudice from other students, their parents, and school staff. Our interviews with a group of several Muslim families has shown that the harassment often did not meet any reaction from school employees, and significantly affected the mental state of Muslim and migrant students.

Additionally, during the coronavirus pandemic, there was a visible lack of school and parental support in remote education for students with a migration background. This resulted from the parents’ lack of appropriate ICT skills, the language barrier, and marginalizing the problems of migrant children in Polish schools. The difficult situation of migrant students in Polish schools was confirmed by a report by the Supreme Audit Office of 2020 which showed “a complete lack of interest in this issue by the Minister of National Education” and stressed that “the ministry does not monitor the situation, does not perform appropriate analyses, has practically no knowledge about it and has done nothing to obtain it.”

One could expect that during a pandemic and because of the poor economic situation and the catastrophe in the healthcare system, politicians would resign from the populist, fear-mongering style of rhetoric. Unfortunately, it is not the case. In 2020, the Polish political scene witnessed several serious Islamophobic statements during the presidential elections campaign and after it. What is important is that right-wing politicians have managed to create and maintain the widespread belief that a Muslim equals an immigrant, and that usually it means a terrorist (which is often, and improperly, used interchangeably with the term “Islamist” who originally meant a scholar of Islam in the Polish language). That is why statements on terrorist attacks connected with migration or/and refugees are also treated here as examples of Islamophobia – one of their aims is fearmongering against Islam and its believers.

Generally, there are three groups of politicians using Islamophobic discourse in their public speech or other forms of expression. First, there are the politicians connected to the far-right, nationalist party Konfederacja (Confederation) and other nationalist groups. This group includes Krzysztof Bosak (MP, Konfederacja party’s candidate in the 2020 presidential elections) who at the brink of the election campaign tweeted that “Islam has nothing to do with freedom, therefore its development in Poland should be stopped”;12 Robert Winnicki (MP, leader of National Movement) who said that the Independence March is comprised of people who “do not want to follow their wrong path - multiculturalism, the path of mass migration, the path of cultural savagery and desolation”;13 Grzegorz Braun (MP) who is infamous for his anti-Semitic statements, but is identified as a member of a wider Islamophobic movement;14 Janusz Korwin-Mikke (MP) who is constantly warning that “Muslims will come and conquer us”;15 and Robert Bątkiewicz (a leader of the March of Independence Association) who appealed to the participants of the 2020 Independence March to become “knights” ready to “conquer Jerusalem.”16

The second group consists of politicians from the ruling party and its allies. This group includes some top politicians who were active this year, especially Joachim Brudziński (a former Minister of Internal Affairs and Administration, currently a European MP) who associated the Nice attacks with the policy of welcoming refugees,17 and Zbigniew Ziobro (Minister of Justice, Prosecutor General, and a leader of the Solidarna Polska party), who one month before the planned date of the presidential elections tweeted that “Islam is alien to our culture” and claimed that Poland is defending its sovereignty by not welcoming refugees.18 Furthermore, Ziobro has built a milieu of politicians who effectively use Islamophobic and fearmongering messages about Islam to gain political influence. These include Patryk Jaki (currently a European MP, famous for creating one of the most Islamophobic election spots in October 2018) who claimed that Islam or anarchy will fill the empty spaces left by Christianity; Dominik Tarczyński (currently a European MP) who warned in March 2020 that “sharia is barbarism and its opposing our system”; local politicians like Dariusz Matecki, a member of a local council in Szczecin, an editor of the fan pages of Ziobro and the Ministry of Justice, and author of one of the most popular Islamophobic fan pages in the EU (No to Islamization of Europe, ndie.pl); and around 30 others.

There are also often, but not systematic, Islamophobic statements coming from less important or local politicians of the ruling party PiS like Kazimierz Smoliński (MP), who in 2020 tweeted that “immigrants are tormenting homosexuals in Sweden” using the popular right-wing Islamophobic myth that presents Sweden as a huge “no-go zone” and spreading fake information about an unspecified group of immigrants (implicitly referring to Muslims) attacking homosexuals. There are also statements like that of Józef Kardyś, the governor of Kolbuszowa, a small town in southeastern Poland, who claimed that the young people who protested against the near total ban on abortion imposed by the ruling party in the end of October 2020 should “go to mosques, they leave headless,” suggesting they would be beheaded by the believers of Islam who allegedly have no tolerance. We can say that this Islamophobic stance is quite common among members of Konfederacja and PiS, but that only specific politicians use Islamophobia as a fuel to gain attention. The figure connecting the environment of Konfederacja and PiS is Adam Andruszkiewicz, who is a PiS MP and the Secretary of State and who used to be a member of the National Movement and the All-Polish Youth. He is one of the most active Islamophobic pol-

19. The spot was contested by the Ombudsman’s Office. Despite the court’s repeated recommendations to deal with the case, the prosecutor’s office, led by Zbigniew Ziobro, discontinued the investigation several times. Rzecznik Praw Obywatelskich, RPO po raz kolejny skarży umorzenie sprawy antyuchodźczego spotu PiS z 2018 r., https://www.rpo.gov.pl/pl/content/rpo-po-raz-kolejny-umorzenie-sprawy-antyuchodzczego-spotu-pis-z-2018, (last accessed: November 15, 2020).
iticians in Poland, trying to show the so-called connection between immigration, Islam, terrorist attacks, and the policy of the opposition parties.26

What is important is that these common Islamophobic stances affect the anti-immigration policy of the ruling party. One striking example is that EU funds for immigrants and asylum seekers are going to be used to buy 308 limousines and cars for ministries and other state offices. The news emerged in the end of October, at the very peak of the coronavirus pandemic.27

The third group of politicians using Islamophobic fuel are opposition politicians who are constantly comparing the PiS government to “Islam” or “Islamic countries.” A good example is Krzysztof Brejza, a member of the Polish Senate from the party Platforma Obywatelska, who, in October 2020, tweeted: “The prosecutor’s office of Ziobro lets out the perpetrator of a woman-beater - so it encourages bandits to beat women. After forcing them to give birth to dead children, consent to beatings is the next stage of PiS fundamentalism. Women are like objects. As in some Islamic countries.”28 Among the supporters of the opposition, there is a certain phenomenon that can be described as comparing the ruling party to Muslims which, of course, is supposed to be a form of depreciation. The term “PiSlam,” connecting Islam and PiS, is often used.

29. Figure was compiled by Karol Wilczyński and Piotr Sobczyk based on research on Twitter between 11th Oct 2020 and 31st Dec 2020.
Generally, our research on Twitter shows that Islamophobic tweets help politicians gain attention and that Islam mobilizes the audience, especially emotionally. (Fig. 1)

Media

Despite the coronavirus pandemic, there were a lot of Islamophobic media events in Polish media in 2020. There are three main groups of media reproducing harmful Islamophobic stereotypes and Muslim racism: the mainstream media, the far-right media, and the nationalist and Catholic media. Among the mainstream media, the most important is the Polish state TV (TVP), currently under total control of the ruling party, which frequently broadcasts Islamophobic material. Examples include “the new demographic attack on Europe”, 30 “the brutal Islamization of Europe”31 or “the European left who want to secularize Muslims” but have not succeed and therefore Islam is still a serious danger.32 TVP hires journalists who often publish Islamophobic views on their personal Twitter accounts. A good example is Dominika Cosic, a reporter based in France, who claimed, for instance, that “Muslims are taking advantage of their growing strength and impose their rules”33 or Michał Rachoń, a TVP presenter, who warned that welcoming immigrants ends up in “Muslims attacks and riots.”34 Another PiS-owned state media outlet devoted to promoting Islamophobic stereotypes is the local radio station in Szczecin (Radio Szczecin), which is connected to Dariusz Matecki (cf. Politics section). It publishes a lot of material on “Muslim migrants” organizing riots in Sweden,35 and terrorist networks that infiltrate the country through religious schools and institutions.36

Ignorance or a kind of fear of Islam is rather widespread among Polish journalists. Usually, they do not know how to report, they do not know the situation in countries with Muslim-majority societies, and they follow foreign agencies in, for example, emphasizing the religious affiliation or nationality of the terrorists -

as long as the nationality is Arab and the religion is Muslim. There are figures like former editor-in-chief of Super-Express, one of the biggest newspapers in Poland, Sławomir Jastrzębowski, who tweeted that “he sees a threat in Islam.”\(^{37}\) On the other hand, a lot of liberal media and journalists use the term “PiSlam” to criticize the government. Most left-wing and anti-government media outlets republished the Charlie Hebdo Islamophobic caricature comparing the cult of Pope John Paul II to the cult of the Prophet Muhammad.\(^{38}\) Poland under PiS rule is often called “Catotaliban” and anti-government journalists often warn that the government will soon impose a Catholic version of sharia in Poland. Another, smaller trend in mainstream media which was relevant in 2020 is portraying Pakistan as a “typical Islamic country,” where minorities are persecuted and people are forced to be Muslims. This trend is an example of how right-wing and biased media influence the mainstream.\(^{39}\)

In the polarized Polish media scene, it is hard to find mainstream journalists trying to overcome the biased and negative view of Islam and its followers. Editors and authors of Polish mainstream media who frequently publish reliable stories on events in countries with Muslim-majority populations are Marcin Żyła and Wojciech Jagielski (Tygodnik Powszechny); Bartłomiej Rumieńczyk (Onet.pl); Patryk Strzałkowski (Gazeta.pl); Marta Urzędowska and Blanka Rogowska (Gazeta Wyborcza); Agnieszka Lichnerowicz (Tok FM); and Marta K. Nowak (Oko.press). Freelance journalists and authors who are sources of reliable information include Paweł Pieniążek, Ludwika Włodek, or less-known media projects like Outride.rs, and blogs (Stosunkowo Bliski Wschód, ReOrient, Polka na Pustyni, Zwykły Zeszyt). There are researchers and academics like Katarzyna Górak-Sosnowska (Szkoła Główna Handlowa, Warsaw) or Karolina Rak (Jagiellonia University, Kraków) who try to be active in media. Finally, there is IslamistaBlog.pl, a project run by the authors of this report, which is currently the most popular platform on Islam in Polish (since 1st March 2021 its new name is SalamLab.pl). Still, there are very few sources of reliable information on Islam in the Polish language and there is a great need for workshops for journalists covering stories about Muslims and/or migration (cf. Policy Recommendation section).

Obviously, there is a whole section of right-wing and/or nationalist media which frequently feed their readers with negative (and often fake) news about Islam and Muslims. These include, among others:

- wpolityce.pl - one of the most influential and popular right-wing platforms in Poland, closely connected to the PiS ruling party.\textsuperscript{40}
- “Najwyższy Czas” – a media outlet connected to Janusz Korwin-Mikke, \textit{Konfederacja MP}.\textsuperscript{41}
- Nationalistic media outlets such as pantarhei24.com,\textsuperscript{42} tysol.pl,\textsuperscript{43} wiadomosci.eu,\textsuperscript{44} (connected to Dariusz Matecki and ndie.pl), Media Narodowe,\textsuperscript{45} konserwatyzm.pl,\textsuperscript{46} and Magna Polonia.\textsuperscript{47}
- Websites with a Christian “vibe” but officially not connected to any religious institutions such as Fronda.pl,\textsuperscript{48} annur.pl,\textsuperscript{49} andpch24.pl.\textsuperscript{50}

The problem with these websites and media outlets is not only that they publish Islamophobic and biased content but that they also spread it across social media,

\textsuperscript{40} For example: 1. wgospodarce.pl, „Były szef wywiadu Niemiec: Islam zagrożeniem dla Europy” https://wgospodarce.pl/informacje/75594-byly-szef-wywiadu-niemiec-islam-zagrozeniem-dla-europy provoking racist and hateful comments. The editors leave comments like “the Islamic plague should be kneaded like bedbugs.”

The last category is the Catholic media, in other words, the media that is owned by the Catholic Church or Catholic institutions, which, considering the size, could be included into mainstream media section. The Islamophobia present in such media has a special character, because it presents Islam as a threat to the Church and Christian values. Those who write in these media outlets also use the discourse of the conflict between religions. One of the main examples is Gość Niedzielny, one of the most popular weeklies and websites in Poland. Second is KAI (Catholic News Agency in Poland), which constantly republishes Islamophobic content from the Polish section of Vatican Radio. This news is then published by most of the Catholic media in Poland like Niedziela, Deon.pl, Stacja 7, etc. Another example is Radio Maryja, a very controversial and Catholic fundamentalist media outlet, that is constantly fueling Islamophobic sentiments among its readers.

All in all, however, we can observe that the number of Islamophobic publications decreased in 2020, probably due to the pandemic (cf. Internet section).

Justice System

In 2020, the Ministry of the Interior Affairs published information on the incidents caused by hatred towards or with the participation of national and ethnic minorities in Poland in 2018-2019 stating that the number of incidents motivated by hatred significantly dropped. But according to the Polish Ombudsman’s Office, these figures are significantly understated and do not reflect the nature of the problem.

Twenty years after Poland adopted the directive implementing the principle of equal treatment of persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin (Directive 2000/43/EC of 29 June 2000), the country still lacks a comprehensive strategy for counteracting hate crimes. For the last two years, Prime Minister Mateusz Morawiecki has been reminded of the need to create such a strategy by the Office of the Ombudsman but despite the 20 recommendations for systemic changes in law and practice proposed by the office in 2019, no changes were introduced.58

Monitoring conducted by the Polish Ombudsman’s Office shows that migrants, Muslims, representatives of certain national and ethnic minorities, LGBT+ people, and activists of civil society organizations in Poland have the biggest problems with obtaining protection against hate crimes. The prosecutor’s office often refuses to initiate proceedings in such cases, discontinues them, or conducts them on a long-term basis for no apparent reason.59 According to the Office of the Ombudsman, law enforcement agencies contribute to the promotion of racist ideology or to the spreading of hatred based on prejudice.

In 2020, after the intervention of the Office of the Ombudsman, the court ordered the prosecutor’s office to re-examine the case of the Islamophobic PiS party election spot accused of incitement to hatred and used in the 2018 local elections campaign. In the opinion of the Office of the Ombudsman, the spot violates the law prohibiting incitement to hatred on the basis of national, ethnic, racial, or religious differences. In September 2020, the prosecutor’s office discontinued the proceedings in this case60 – following a similar pattern with such cases.

In September 2020, parliament passed an act limiting ritual slaughter in Poland only to the needs of local religious associations. In October, the senate adopted an amendment to this law removing restrictions on the ritual slaughter of poultry. The new regulations on limiting ritual slaughter will come into force at the end of 2025.61

As mentioned above, there are a lot of websites and media which publish Islamophobic content. However, we can observe a decreasing interest in biased information about Islam on the Internet and social media. Many previously Islamophobic websites - often connected to the ruling party, nationalist parties or organizations, or the Catholic Church - are now turning to news about the “fake virus” or promoting not wearing protective masks, etc. Ndie.pl (“No to Islamization of Europe”) owned by Dariusz Matecki, an associate of Zbigniew Ziobro, the Minister of Justice and Prosecutor General, is still publishing some Islamophobic content but with clearly lower frequency, similarly to other outlets.

Unfortunately, there are still many active groups and communities, which often publish comments, which are not openly islamophobic on current events like murders by Muslim migrants, etc. Leaders of these group use a lot of keywords like “cultural enrichment” to let you know what their thoughts are, but not say it out loud. Those who comment on these entries allow themselves a lot more, and the moderators do nothing about it. A good example is the Polish Defense League in Mazowsze and its moderator, Dariusz Biały. There are radical Catholic groups which publish or distribute Islamophobic content, appealing to the defense of Poland and the Church from Islam. There is also the media group Idź pod prąd (Go against the current) led by protestant pastor Chojecki, who attacks the pope and the Catholic Church for its official (though, not popular in Poland) stance to build dialogue with Islam and accuses Muslims of terror, killing gays, and Americans.

Islamophobic authors are also active on Twitter. They include journalists (cf. Media section), but also regular supporters of the PiS or Konfederacja parties, or even fantasy novel writers. We analyzed Islamophobic entries on Twitter in the last quarter of 2020 and a few common trends can be observed, apart from the increase of the reach of Islamophobic tweets by politicians (cf. Politics section). First, we can observe that there is always a correlation between the number of tweets on Islam and terrorist attacks (even if they are not carried out by Muslims). (Fig. 2)

Another trend is that positive stories are often neglected by the users of Polish Twitter. After the attack in Vienna, we checked the popularity of the story of the three Muslim men who saved the life of a woman and a policeman. Unfortunately, it was retweeted or commented by only less than 1.5% of users. (Fig. 3)

We also analyzed how often Polish Twitter users use the term “PiSlam,” which - surprisingly - is also correlated with the dates of terrorist attacks and also with the days of intense critique of the Polish government (see November 9 in the figure below). (Fig. 4)

As was mentioned above, central figures in the Polish Islamophobic networks still receive significant institutional support which provides them with financial stability. Being anchored to governmental institutions, far-right media outlets, think tanks, and the Catholic Church, they are able to spread their messages across different socioeconomic groups.

Two important members of Islamophobic networks in the country are Dominik Tarczyński (cf. Politics section), a European MP from the ruling party PiS; and Dariusz Matecki, a member of the local city council in Szczecin and a close associate of Zbigniew Ziobro, the Minister of Justice in the PiS government and a Prosecutor General. Their Islamophobic messages in 2020 contain stereotypes like “police being afraid of offending Muslim criminals”;75 repeating the discriminatory slogan that a Muslim equals a terrorist;76 and that “Latin civilization” is under threat from “Barbaric Islam.” In church circles, the figure spreading Islamophobia is Dariusz Kowalczyk, a Catholic priest, a Jesuit, a Polish professor of theology working at Vatican universities in Rome, and a journalist in the Polish Catholic press. His Islamophobic entries relating to the clash of civilizations theory and ridiculing the idea of interreligious dialogue can be found on his Facebook profile.77

As was observed at the end of 2019, in 2020, the main Islamophobic websites, social media channels, and important individuals (cf. Media and Internet sections) focused more on questioning the existence of the pandemic and attacking the LGBT+ community, usually combining homophobia and Islamophobia in one message. Some of mainstream Islamophobic channels were deleted by social media corporations. The most well-known cases were deleting the Facebook profile of Janusz Korwin-Mikke (cf. Politics section) followed by 800,000 users, and the Facebook profile “Based Poland” with around 200,000 followers. The Based Poland profile was led by Adam Starzyński, a TV Republika journalist and a member of the international far-right Islamophobic group MEGA (“Make Europe Great Again”).78 The most important Catholic figures of the Islamophobia network, such as the priests Dariusz Oko or Roman Kneblewski, were devoted to fighting the LGBT+ community, and were not recorded as engaging in Islamophobic speech this year.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

As in previous years, there were no systematic and countrywide initiatives to counter Islamophobia. The most important official institution fighting xenophobia and Islamophobia quite systematically is the Office of Ombudsman and Ombudsman Adam Bodnar. A 2020 report of the Ombudsman Office, appeals to the Prime Minister in the following words, “Fear and resentment towards migrants - reinforced by an unskillful and often even deliberately manipulated public debate - contributes to an increase in hate crimes against foreigners, especially people from the Middle East and followers of Islam. This proved that in mass-threatening situations it does not take much for hatred to escalate, especially against groups traditionally exposed to such crimes.”79

For the first time since 1989, the court sentenced the owner of the far-right weekly magazine Gazeta Polska for publishing a racist photomontage. The District Court in Gdańsk ordered the publisher to apologize to the authors of the original works Rafał Wojczal and Wojciech Wilczyński, and to pay the amount of PLN 20,000 (c. EUR 4,500) for the Polish Humanitarian Action.80 The cover showed a group of people from the Middle East with the words “Refugees brought deadly diseases. Shocking German report!”

There were also positive messages from the Catholic bishops on the occasion of the Day of Islam in the Catholic Church, which is traditionally celebrated at the end of January every year. Archbishop Marek Jędraszewski sent a letter to Muslims from Krakow and bishop Henryk Ciereszko said that bishops “are not afraid to be open to Islam.” The initiative, dating back to late 1990s, however, is not popular in Poland.82

---

81. Ibid.

There was also a great initiative by European MP Janina Ochojska, the leader and founder of Polska Akcja Humanitarna, who organized an exhibition with works of Moria refugees which also focused on the role of Muslim women. There was also an article and popular crowdfunding campaign to support young Muslim girls providing education in refugee camps in Greece conducted by Anna Alboth, a journalist and activist.

It is good to note that an initiative by a part of the Muslim community of Poland to support Polish women during Women’s Strike, which opposes the near total ban on abortion in Poland, was very popular among the participants.

It is also worth mentioning that there were a few books published by Polish authors on Islam and Muslim communities: Lajla znaczy noc (Layla means night) about the coexistence of Muslim and Christian communities in Andalusia by Aleksandra Lipczak; U nas każdy jest prorokiem (Everyone is a prophet here) on Tatar Muslims living in Poland by Bartosz Panek; Gorsze dzieci republiki (The worse children of the Republic) on Algerians living in France by Ludwika Włodek; and Wojownicy o szklanych oczach (The warriors with the glass eyes) on Turkey by Agnieszka Rostkowska. All these works were an opportunity to start a debate in mainstream media and to promote a more nuanced view of Islam and Muslim communities (cf. Media section to see names of mainstream journalists and media projects which help to spread knowledge and reliable information about Muslims).

The authors of this report, we are involved in constantly trying to change the situation and to create a more complex and nuanced view of Islam. We have created the most popular platform on this topic in Polish, namely islamistablog.pl (since 1st Mar 2021 it is called SalamLab.pl). This year, we created a Muslim map of Poland to persuade Poles to visit attractive spots and symbols of Muslim presence in Poland. We also provided Polish readers with hundreds of news concerning Muslim communities, organized a “Virtual Iftar” at the end of Ramadan, and online discussions about Islam. The lack of funding and institutional support, however, remains a challenge.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

There is a dire need to regulate the issue of hate speech as has been made clear in the recommendations from international bodies, and a need to create a comprehensive strategy to counteract hate crimes using the systemic recommendations provided by the Ombudsman in 2019.90 Specific changes should contain the following:

A) introducing a statutory definition of hate speech in Polish law;
B) amending the provisions of the Criminal Code in terms of penalizing membership in organizations promoting or inciting racial hatred or participation in all types of such activities;
C) introducing a state-supported hate crime online monitoring system;
D) introducing an obligation on the part of Internet service providers and media outlets to notify law enforcement authorities in the case of hate speech activities under threat of a proportionate administrative sanction;
E) creating and financing effective systemic solutions aimed at providing foreigners (especially refugees) with a sense of belonging to the community, adequate social and living support;
F) providing financial and organizational support for NGOs fighting against hate crimes.

Additionally, it is necessary for NGOs to engage intensively in activities related to the education in the field of hate crimes, and to offer training for students, teachers, public institutions, media, and other entities in the field of countering hate crimes and discrimination with the support of state and local authorities. It is also recommended to introduce actions to make the administrators of commercial Internet news portals aware of the wide range of obligations (moderating, filtering, removing comments) in relation to entries that may constitute hate speech.

A month before the planned date of the presidential elections in April 2020, Zbigniew Ziobro, Minister of Justice, Prosecutor General, and a leader of the party Solidarna Polska, tweeted that “Islam is alien to our culture” and suggested that Poland should defend itself against it.

Chronology

- 01.01.2020: At the brink of the election campaign, Krzysztof Bosak (MP and the far-right Konfederacja party’s candidate in the presidential elections in 2020) tweeted that “Islam has nothing to do with freedom, therefore its development in Poland should be stopped.”

• 12.01.2020: Polish Radio quotes foreign members of anti-Islamic parties and fosters fearmongering about the growing number of Muslims.

• 23.01.2020: A case of French teenager, Milo, offending Islam becomes viral in most Polish mainstream media without any comment.

• 10.03.2020: Dominik Tarczyński, European MP from the PiS ruling party, posted a Facebook video where he said that “Sharia law is a barbarism.” There were almost 2,000 reactions to this post and it was shared almost 500 times.

• 02.04.2020: The news on TVP1 published a piece accusing refugees in camps in Greece of spreading the coronavirus. The TVP broadcast was full of manipulations and false news, the Court of Justice of the European Union judgment was used to present refugees as an epidemiological threat, and to identify them once again with “Muslim terrorists” responsible for attacks in Europe. Since 2015, the latter has been a constant theme on public television. In addition, the report broadcast clusters of pictures deprived of context. It is not known where and when it was recorded: they showed groups of refugees loaded with luggage, crowding along the Turkish border behind barbed wire, or dark-skinned men and women in hijab watched by a policeman. These images were juxtaposed with snapshots taken during terrorist attacks.

• 04.04.2020: Via Twitter, the TVP correspondent in Germany, Cezary Gmyz, shared information accusing Muslims in Berlin of allegedly gathering in front of a mosque, which could have created a threat of spreading the coronavirus. This material was made available from an account of the far-right AfD party. Gmyz’s post sparked a wave of anti-Islamic comments visible on his profile.

• 06.04.2020: In an interview on the main state television station, the Minister of Justice and Prosecutor General said, “We defended our sovereignty from a culture of Islam which is alien to us and which was forced upon us.” The tweet containing this part of the interview was published on his official Twitter account and retweeted more than 300 times.

• 08.04.2020: During the program “Biedrzycka Express,” aired on YouTube on the Super Express channel, which was mainly devoted to the problem of the coronavirus pandemic, Janusz Korwin-Mikke (Confederation), a member of the Polish Parliament, made the following statement, “Men must know how to kill. If we don’t know how to kill, we’ll be slaughtered by Arabs, by Chinese, by anyone.” The journalist, Kamila Biedrzycka, did not comment on this statement in any way.

• 18.05.2020: On the radical right-wing internet YouTube television channel Idź Pod Prąd, Paweł Chojecki, the leader of a religious group called the New Covenant Church, insulted members of the association Nigdy Więcej and Pope Francis, by saying that the pope is “a worshiper of pagan idols. This is a man who claims that Catholics believe in the same God as the followers of Muhammad, so he is a spiritual impostor.”

- 30.05.2020: Janusz Kowalski, secretary of state in the Ministry of State Assets and a member of the parliament from the Solidarna Polska (Solidarity Poland) party, posted an entry on his Twitter profile calling for rejecting migrants coming to Poland because of their Muslim background. He stated: “The deputy head of the Civic Platform, Rafał Trzaskowski, was in 2015 the face of the idea of accepting Muslim immigrants at the request of Brussels. This politician, in my opinion, will accept any number of culturally alien Muslim immigrants at Berlin’s call. Do you want this?”. Kowalski published this comment during the campaign before the elections in which Trzaskowski ran for the president of the Republic of Poland.91

- 25.07.2020: The decision to turn Hagia Sophia into a mosque sparks Islamophobic comments across far-right websites.

- 10.08.2020: The journalist and writer Rafał Ziemkiewicz made Islamophobic comments on YouTube channel wRealu24. When asked by presenter, Piotr Szlachtowicz, about the situation in Lebanon and the reasons for the explosion, which took place in Beirut on August 4 (as a result, 190 people were killed and over 6,500 were injured), he said, inter alia: “In the 1960s, Lebanon was the Switzerland of the Near East. A wonderful, beautiful, rich country where everyone would like to live; [it was a] Christian country. Later, Muslims began to appear there. And when Muslims appear somewhere, sooner or later the jihad starts, the war begins”92.

- 23.09.2020: Janusz Korwin-Mikke, a far-right politician and MP of Konfederacja party, published a blog entry stating “we will most probably be conquered by Arabs or some other Muslims, which are powerful, because men are ruling there.”

- 29.10.2020: Joachim Brudziński, a prominent PiS ruling party politician and an MP, after the Nice attack, posted a tweet connecting terrorism with refugees from Tunisia.

- 06.11.2020: A spokesman for the District Prosecutor’s Office in Ostrów Wielkopolski, Maciej Meler, announced that a 32-year-old resident of Pleszew, Przemysław R., was convicted of “public incitement to racial, ethnic and religious hatred. With his entry, he insulted people who profess Islam and women who were in relationships with the followers of this religion”. The man posted the following comment on the social network: “It’s not a Pole anymore, but a ciapate rag! A Polish woman who lives with a Muslim is no longer a Pole!”. The District Court in Pleszew ordered the perpetrator to a fine of PLN 2,000 (around 450 euros) and obliged him to pay the costs of the court proceedings\textsuperscript{93}.

- 11.11.2020: Far-right and nationalist organizations carried out the illegal March of Independence. The leader of the march, Robert Bąkiewicz, appealed to the participants to become “true knights” who are able to “conquer the Jerusalem.”

- 18.12.2020: A former Catholic priest and far-right nationalist activist and speaker, Jacek M., was acquitted by the court in Wrocław. In a film posted on social media, and later deleted, the former priest, according to the prosecutor’s office, said, “Brenton had a little right to behave like this. Why? Because he saw the direction in which this supposedly civilized world is going.” He added, “He had the moral right to chop the heads of Muslims who died in the hands of hundreds of whites.” “In defense of the white race and Latin civilization, those specific invaders who threaten us must be murdered.” In his decision, among other things, the judge wrote that the words quoted by the prosecutor’s office were taken out of context, and that the defendant “at no point in his speech approved of the acts of the killer Brenton Tarrant and did not call for racially motivated murders.” The court included an expert opinion in the field of forensic linguistics who stated that Jacek M.’s statements were not hate speech.

Executive Summary

Almost 65,000 Muslims live in Romania accounting for 0.34% of the total population. The presence and integration of Muslims in Romania remains an issue that draws minor interest on the political and public agenda.

Although no significant incidents regarding Muslims and immigrants have been recorded in Romania during 2020, Islamophobic and anti-immigrant rhetoric was present, especially in nationalist and Christian Orthodox media outlets. Activities in cyberspace of anti-Islam activists and sympathisers of extremist political parties had low visibility during the reporting period. Hate speech directed at Muslims was recorded, although to a lesser extent than in previous years.

Hate crimes and cases of incitement to hatred remain underreported. Few official complaints have been made compared to the large number of people reportedly experiencing incidents of racial/ethnic or religious discrimination. Still, there is no systemic data collection regarding hate crimes and other types of violence directed at immigrants or Muslims by the Romanian authorities.
Aproape 65.000 de musulmani trăiesc în România, reprezentând 0,34% din totalul populației. Prezența și integrarea musulmanilor în România rămâne, ca și în cazul imigrației în ansamblu, o problemă marginală pe agenda politică și publică. Deși în anul 2020 nu s-au înregistrat incidente semnificative cu privire la musulmani și imigranți, retorica anti-imigrație, și ostilitatea față de musulmani a continuat să fie prezenta, în special în mass-media naționalistă și creștin ortodoxă.

În spațiul online, vizibilitatea activiștilor anti-Islam și a simpatizanții partidelor politice extremistă a fost redusă pe durata perioadei raportate. Au fost înregistrate cazuri de discurs instigator la ură directionat împotriva musulmanilor, însă într-o manieră redusă comparativ cu anii anteriori.

Infracțiunile motivate de ură și cazurile de incitare la ură rămân insuficient raportate. Au fost făcute puține plângeri oficiale în comparație cu numărul mare de persoane care susțin că se confruntă cu incidente de discriminare rasială / etnică sau religioasă. În continuare, la nivelul autorităților nu există un sistem unitar de colectare a datelor privind infracțiunile motivate de ură și alte tipuri de violență îndreptată împotriva imigranților sau musulmanilor.

Statistics on Islamophobia: A 2019 survey from the National Council for Combating Discrimination (NCCD) revealed that 68% of Romanians have a lack of trust in relation to people of Muslim faith, and 62% of those interviewed think that Muslims are potentially dangerous. Around 39% of the respondents would not accept having a Muslim relative, 28% would not accept having a Muslim friend, and 19% would not accept a Muslim co-worker.

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: There are no designated procedures for recording hate crimes by the Romanian police. Consequently, criminal offenses committed with a bias motivation cannot be identified through the system. According to the National Council for Combating Discrimination (NCCD), in 2019, there were 904 petitions registered, out of which the largest number of petitions received were on the grounds of belonging to a social category (386) and the smallest numbers were on grounds of race (1) and HIV status (4). There were 32 petitions submitted on the grounds of religion and beliefs. The NCCD found discrimination in 192 cases, out of which only 9 were on grounds of religion and beliefs.

Introduction

Romania features mostly as a country of emigration, registering a population decrease of 6% since 2007, the third highest decrease in the European Union. Romania had the fifth largest emigrant population in member countries of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). The presence and integration of immigrants in Romanian society remains marginal in the political and public debates.

According to the 2011 census there were 64,337 registered Muslims in Romania that make up under 1% of the total population. Most Muslims in Romania live in urban settlements (49,795) with the Turks and Tartars being the largest Islamic communities. A total of 20,561 Turks and 14,376 Tartars live in urban areas, whereas 6,342 Turks and 5,684 Tartars are registered in the villages of southern Romania. Most Muslims are located in the county of Constanta (43,279) and Bucharest (9,037).

Islam is one of the 18 registered religious denominations specified in Romanian law. In the last census, Muslims accounted for 0.34% of the population.

Despite the small number of immigrants living in Romania, some hostility towards Muslims and anti-immigrant rhetoric were present, albeit sporadically, in the public sphere during the year. The results from a survey published by the National Council for Combating Discrimination (NCCD) were released in February 2019 and revealed that 68% of Romanians have a lack of trust in relation to people of Muslim faith, while 62% of those interviewed think that Muslims are potentially dangerous. Around 39% of the respondents would not accept having a Muslim relative, and 28% would not accept having a Muslim friend, and 19% would not accept a Muslim co-worker.
In an article in Al Jazeera, however, it is noted that as opposed to other countries in Eastern Europe “Romanian Muslims say their experience has largely been one of peaceful coexistence.” 6 Vlad Stoicescu, a Romanian journalist who coordinates an investigation about religious cults in Romania, stated that the Muslim community in southern Romania is well-integrated and while anti-Islamic discourse is present among some nationalist intellectuals, among ordinary people it is seldom heard. 7

Physical and Verbal Attacks

Based on the sources consulted, no information on racially motivated violence and incidents directed at Muslims could be found during the reporting period. There is no systemic data collection regarding hate crime and hate speech by the Romanian authorities.

The Council of Europe’s European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) mentions in their 2019 report the shortcomings of the Romanian system’s capability of data collection on hate speech and hate-motivated crimes in a systematic manner. 8 The European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (EU-FRA) also noted that Romania’s law enforcement agencies do not record the bias motivations of hate crimes. 9

Civil society groups and international expert organisations assess that hate crime is generally underreported by victims due to a lack of trust in the willingness or ability of the authorities to investigate these cases effectively. 10 Moreover the lack of understanding among police officers regarding what a hate crime is and how to investigate the bias motive of a crime contribute to underreporting. Criminal law action is very rarely taken against hate crimes, and provisions on racist motivation as aggravating circumstances are also rarely applied.

The OSCE ODHIR’s reporting on hate crime in Romania notes that law enforcement agencies have not recorded the bias motivations of hate crimes. 11 The last available data was for 2018 and revealed there were only 2 hate crimes recorded by the police and 2 ensuing prosecutions.12

In one publicized case which took place in August 2020, seven migrants (six Syrians and an Egyptian) attempting to cross the Romanian border from Serbia claimed that they were physically assaulted by the Romanian border police with whips, sticks, and batons. The Romanian border police denied the allegations, while Romanian NGOs working on monitoring asylum procedures said they were not aware of alleged violence at the border.13 During 2020, there were no significant anti-Muslims/immigration protests or campaigns recorded.

Employment

No significant developments with regard to the employment of Muslims were reported during the period under investigation. In the last data available (for 2019), the NCCD registered 432 petitions about access to employment. In 41 of these cases, fines were issued, while another 37 received a warning. However, the data is not disaggregated by criteria such as ethnic origin or religion.14

In 2020, the largest number of foreign workers in Romania were of Turkish citizenship, with 5,575 active employees.15 The number of work permits issued for foreign workers between January and October 2020 was 17,578, almost 6,000 less than the previous year. The decrease in the number of work permits issued was due to the Covid-19 pandemic.16 Media outlets have reported that because of the pandemic many foreign workers in Romania have lost their jobs, have not received their salary or have received partial payments.17

The education system in Romania guarantees a high degree of support for minority languages. In 2011, Romania adopted an education law which provides tuition for a minimum number of pupils in minority languages at various levels. The only educational institution for the training of imams in Romania is the Kemal Ataturk National College in Medgidia, where a theological profile class operates. Turkey offers scholarships for graduates of the college but due to the shrinking number of Muslims in Romania very few apply.

During the reporting period, there were no recorded cases of discrimination of Muslims in education.

Politics

Legislative elections were held in December 2020. In the aftermath of an inconclusive vote, the centre-right National Liberal Party (PNL), the centrist USR PLUS, and the Democratic Union of the Hungarians in Romania (UDMR), which represents Romania’s ethnic Hungarians, formed a coalition government. The Alliance for the Unity of Romanians (AUR), a newly formed right-wing party managed to obtain 9% of the vote in its first electoral showing. The AUR is regarded as an anti-system party with strong nationalistic, Orthodox Christian, and Eurosceptic undertones. The elections and its aftermath were dominated by health and economic measures aimed at tackling the COVID-19 pandemic. Immigration and the integration of foreigners in Romania were absent from the political agenda of the current parliamentary parties.

Elections for the European Parliament were held in May 2019, and according to the European Web Site on Integration none of the winning parties in this election included in their programmes any information about integration of migrants or refugees. The National Liberal Party, the Social Democratic Party, and Alliance 2020 (Save Romania Union [USR] and the Freedom, Unity and Solidarity Party [PLUS]) have discussed migration only with respect to border security, while other parties such as the PRP (Pro Romania Party) and the UDMR (Democratic Alliance of Hungarians in Romania) did not include the subject of migration at all in their platforms. The only elected party (2 seats) whose programme included initiatives on migration and refugees was the Popular Movement Party (PMP). Their manifesto included ideas on making integration compulsory for migrants, by proposing EU-level regulations which would require acceptance of “the Christian traditions, culture, and habits which are specific to Europe”.

In September 2019, the mayor of Iaşi Mihai Chirica (former PSD member and currently a member of PNL) made racist statements referring to Congolese, Somalis, Syrians, and people from other nations, which he referred to as “[nations] that just came down from the trees”. In January 2020, the NCDD fined the mayor following an investigation.

In an incident reported in July 2020, two parliamentarians from the Social Democratic Party (PSD) got into an argument with the Turkish cashier of a fast-food restaurant in Bucharest after the latter asked them to wear facemasks while in the restaurant. In reply, one of the parliamentarians started insulting the cashier and asked to see his work permit. According to the video camera recording, Adrian Solomon told the cashier: “Yo, Mustafa, you are in Romania here. Hello, Mustafa! Show me you have a working permit here! Yo, tramp!” the PSD MP said. The police issued fines against both MPs for using vulgar language and insults in public, as well as for not respecting the measures imposed by the authorities to fight the Covid-19 pandemic. The NCDD opened an investigation into the case.

Media

Over the years, the media discourse in Romania has used words such as “Islam threat” and “Muslim invasion” to overemphasise the so-called refugee crisis of 2015 in the European Union. Immigration ceased to be an issue on the public agenda during the last couple of years and as such, very few publications, online or otherwise, continued to use bombastic headlines and factual misinterpretations to attract attention to migration or refugees. Among the ones that continued to depict Muslims using stereotypes, or who deliberately manipulated the facts to distort the public opinion, are nationalistic or Orthodox media outlets.

In 2020, some private media outlets continued to depict Muslim refugees or Muslim citizens of European countries as a threat because of their religion. It is worth noting that the vast majority of articles exhibiting Islamophobia refer to the situation and events involving Muslims living in other European countries, rather than the Muslim community in Romania.

Examples of headlines that illustrate the use of stereotypes and misinformation to promote Islamophobia are offered in the figures that follow.

This type of reporting has been limited to a small number of publications, as most media outlets use a balanced, factual approach in reporting news on refugees, immigrants, or Muslims.

Figure 2: “On the Day of the Filthy Muslim Prayer in the Chora Church, Transformed into a Mosque, Turkey Was Struck by a 7 Degrees Earthquake.”

In 2020, no significant legal developments affecting the rights of Muslims were recorded. Available judicial statistics indicate low levels of hate crime in Romania despite regular reporting in the last years on cases of hate crimes. This discrepancy is attributed mainly to the insufficient and/or incorrect gathering of data as well as to a lack of training in personnel who are not sufficiently equipped to tackle this issue.31

The ECRI noted in its 2019 report on Romania that the criminal justice system fails to provide an adequate response to hate crimes due to underreporting of cases, lack of coherent data collection on hate-motivated violence, insufficient training of authorities, and the absence of racial motivation as aggravating circumstance in the criminal prosecution of cases.

It recommended that the authorities take action in a number of areas in this context, such as putting in place a system of data collection and producing statistics offering an integrated and consistent view of cases of racist and homo/transphobic hate speech and hate crime brought to the attention of the police and pursued through the courts, and making this data available to the public.32

The radical groups that were fuelled by the so-called refugee crisis in 2015 have slowly faded from public attention, but sporadically still promote anti-Muslim sentiment in the context of migration in the European Union. However, according to the U.S. Department of State’s report on human rights in Romania “conspiracy theories and antagonistic speech against Muslims continued to appear frequently in social media.”33

Most anti-immigration and anti-Islam promoters have ties with nationalistic movements such as the New Right Party (Partidul Noua Dreaptă). In 2020, the mentioned party has been mostly absent from the public scene, together with most activists linked to it.

The fifth evaluation of the Code of Conduct on Countering Illegal Hate Speech Online, an initiative by the European Commission, has seen continuous progress in the rapid removal of online hate speech by IT companies. Across the EU, reported hate speech has been mostly on the grounds of hate speech (33.1%), xenophobia, including anti-migrant hatred (15.5%), anti-gypsyism (9.9%), and anti-Muslim ha-

tred (9.4%). In Romania, 86 cases of illegal online hate speech were reported with a rate of removal of 96.5%.34

The Facebook page “We don’t want a mega-mosque in Bucharest”,35 initially created to oppose the project of building a grand mosque in Bucharest, which was cancelled, still shares various articles to provoke and manipulate the public opinion. While the page has reduced the frequency of posting significantly, some of the posts shared still promote an anti-immigration or anti-Muslim perspective. However, they receive low to moderate engagement. One such post is the photo below, shared on 9 March 2020, that states “We don’t want Islamic refugees in Romania. Stop the invasion”. (Fig. 4)

!Figure 4: “We Don’t Want Islamic Refugees in Romania. Stop the Invasion”.

The main actors who were promoting Islamophobia in recent years were small far-right movements and parties that use a strong stance on immigration and xenophobic rhetoric in hope of getting popular support. Most of these movements are relatively... obscure and group themselves around the more established Noua Dreaptă (PND), which was registered as a political party in 2015. The PND combines a nationalistic agenda, Orthodox Christian religious convictions, and elements of the fascist ideology of the Legionary Movement (the Romanian fascist movement during World War II). The PND is known to have branches abroad, including the Republic of Moldova, and according to some sources it also maintains political relations with similar anti-European and anti-NATO groups from different countries. At the 2020 legislative elections, the PND got only 0.06% of the votes.

During the year, their activity lacked major visibility and there is no record of any significant campaigns directed against Muslims.

The centre-right People’s Movement Party (PMP) stood out in the last couple of years by being the main initiator of a 2017 legislative proposal to ban face covering in educational institutions which was ultimately rejected, and by the controversial statements regarding migration in the EU made by former president of Romania and current PMP MEP Traian Basescu. At the 2020 legislative elections, the PMP obtained 4.8% of the votes, failing to meet the electoral threshold.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The National Council for Combating Discrimination has become increasingly effective in its work. It has received a growing number of petitions over the years and has provided its expert opinion on judicial proceedings.

The NCCD completed a project aimed at evaluating the transposition of the EU Council Framework Decision on combating certain forms and expressions of racism and xenophobia at the country level. As part of the activities of the project, 12 training sessions on registration and reporting of hate crimes were organised for 144 police and judicial staff.
In 2019, almost 800 refugees and persons with subsidiary protection were participating in the governmental integration programme. The majority were from Syria (349), Iraq (136), and Afghanistan (51). Apart from the integration programme carried out by state institutions, a series of projects run by NGOs were funded through the EU’s Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund, with the aim of supporting the integration of refugees and migrants across the country.41

The Coalition for the Rights of Migrants and Refugees (CDMiR), established in 2017 and comprising of 22 NGO members and five supporters (among them the Romanian UNHCR Office), continued to be the leading civil society initiative aimed at improving the perception of migrants and refugees in the public space, as well as their access to basic rights and services.42

The main NGOs committed to protecting and advancing the interests of Muslims in Romania are Centrul Cultural Islamic “Islamul Azi” (The Islamic Cultural Centre “Islam Today”)43 and Liga Islamica si Culturala din Romania (The Islamic and Cultural League in Romania).44

The presence of Muslims in Romania remains a marginal issue on the political and public agenda. Despite the fact that no major internal developments affecting Muslims were registered during the reporting period, the stereotypical portrayal of Muslims in the media continued, albeit at a lower level compared to previous years. Underreporting of hate crimes coupled with the authorities’ lack of preparation and collaboration in tackling racism and discrimination, remain issues that need to be addressed.

Based on the findings, a series of recommendations are made for relevant authorities and civil society, as follows:

- The authorities should put in place a system to collect, integrate, and publish data on cases of hate speech and hate crime investigated by the police and pursued through the courts.
- Relevant authorities should develop and promote the harmonisation of data collection in areas of hate crime and racism, recognising anti-Muslim bias as a category.
- Hate crime, hate speech, and anti-discrimination legislation should be included in the compulsory initial and continuous training of all law enforcement and legal professionals.

Executive Summary

Despite the Covid-19 crisis, the situation with Islamophobia in Russia is generally in line with the trends outlined in 2019. While Islamophobia is not part of the official state agenda, there is a flip side to the official discourse of a traditional (Russian) Islam, which emanates from the dichotomy of a “good” vs. “bad” Islam. At the official level, Islam is confirmed as belonging to the traditional religions of Russia. Islamophobia often manifests in relation to discourses on migration. For example, the campaign launched in the Russian media and on social networks in connection with the funeral of Abdullah Anzorov, the man who murdered French teacher Samuel Paty. But this campaign can hardly be called Islamophobic - despite certain statements about the “barbaric nature of Islam,” the main protest cannot be associated with the Islamic factor but instead with the Chechen factor. We should note the persistence and strengthening of the discourse of securitization, which is manifested in the polarization of the image of Islam between “correct” traditional and criminalized “radical Islam,” as well as the consideration of Islamic issues in the context of providing security. The tendency to criminalize the activities of certain Muslim movements, abuses in the field of countering terrorism and extremism, and the banning of Muslim literature persist. In 2020, as in 2019, most cases of Islamophobia in Russia were related to the justice system and law enforcement. The most notable remains the persecution of members of the Hizb at-Tahrir, which is banned in Russia. In 2020, there were about 30 sentences under articles related to participation or distribution of materials of this organization. Finally, it is worth noting that a number of Muslim figures have managed to use the extraordinary circumstances of the pandemic to counter Islamophobia in the media.
Резюме
Несмотря на кризис, связанный с пандемией ковид-19, ситуация с исламофобией в России в целом укладывается в обозначенные в 2019 году тенденции. Исламофобия в России не носит систематический характер, оставаясь востребованной у ограниченного круга общественных и политических движений. Исламофобские материалы и сообщества в соцсетях единичны и не представляют собой организованной сети. На официальном уровне подтверждается принадлежность ислама к традиционным религиям России. На уровне отдельных конфликтов зачастую исламофобия является производным элементом дискурсов мигрантофобии и ксенофобии. Например, медийную кампанию, развернувшуюся в СМИ и соцсетях, в связи с похоронами обвиняемого в убийстве французского преподавателя Самюэля Пати, едва ли можно назвать исламофобской – несмотря на отдельные высказывания о «варварской природе ислама», основной протест был связан не столько с исламским, сколько с чеченским фактором. Нельзя не отметить сохранение и укрепление дискурса секьюритизации, что проявляется в поляризации образа ислама между «правильным» традиционным и криминализируемым радикальным исламом, а также рассмотрением исламской проблемы в контексте обеспечения безопасности. Сохраняется тенденция на кriminalизацию деятельности отдельных мусульманских движений, злоупотребления в области противодействия терроризму и экстремизму (особенно, в вопросах, касающихся исламского экстремизма), запрет мусульманской литературы. В 2020 году, как и в 2019, большинство случаев исламофобии в России было связано с системой правосудия и правоохранительной системой. Наиболее заметным остается преследование членов запрещенной в России террористической организации «Хизб ат-Тахрир»: в 2020 году было вынесено около 30 приговоров по статьям, связанным с участием или распространением материалов этой организации. Наконец, стоит отметить, что ряду мусульманских деятелей удалось использовать чрезвычайные обстоятельства пандемии для противодействия исламофобии в медийном поле.

Introduction
The pandemic has become the main transforming factor for almost all spheres of life in 2020. The same cannot be said about Islamophobia in Russia: here we can speak only of a limited influence, while the main trends have remained the same. Islamophobia in Russia is not systematic, remaining in demand among a limited number of social and political movements. At the official level, Islam is confirmed as belonging to the traditional religions of Russia. At the level of individual conflicts, Islamophobia is often a derivative element of discourses of migrant-phobia and xenophobia. The discourse of the securitization of Islam remains constant and is only slightly embedded in the changing circumstances of the pandemic. Thus, the year 2020 saw an increase in migrant-phobic tendencies (not only in Russia, but also in many European states), as migrants became associated with carriers of the disease. Islamophobia, being an organic element of this xenophobic discourse, has also intensified. At the same time, anti-Islamophobic rhetoric from official Muslim clergy has also taken on a new dimension in the context of growing social tensions.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events
Physical and Verbal Attacks
There were several physical and verbal attacks on Muslims in 2020 in Russia.

In February 2020, there were several incidents relating to Muslim prisoners in the Republic of Mordovia. On the night of February 13-14, a group of prisoners rioted in correctional facility № 5. Ibrahim Bakaniev, one of the rioters, was subjected to torture by the heads of the colony. On February 20, a Koran was found in the possession of Nabi Hajiyev in correctional facility № 7. The colony administration demanded that the prisoner surrender the book, which he refused to do and was severely beaten. In response to the wrongful actions of the prison staff, Hajiyev cut his wrists, and his example was followed by a group of other prisoners professing Islam. Violence in prisons by staff members against inmates is a fairly common problem, not only in the context of sectarian conflicts. However, Muslims, especially those convicted of terrorist offences, often suffer abuse in the hands of prison staff. In addition, so-called prison jamaats also attract special attention from prison staff, which are almost impossible to control. “Prison jamaats” refers to well-organized hierarchical communities of Muslims, many of whom are neophytes who have converted to Islam while in prison. This topic is often politicized. Due to the lim-imited access of researchers to this environment, it is almost impossible to obtain objective data on the number of neophytes, while in the media one can often find material in which the authors have manipulated the data on Muslims in prison, creating a climate of fear about the rapid spread of ideas of radical Islam. According to lawyers dealing with such cases, correctional officer, in exceeding their authority, specifically seek to affect the religion and nationality of the convicts. “Muslims have an inner core, they continue to fight and resist in the prison more often than not. That’s why the prison employees are infuriated by the fact that they cannot be broken, that they are not subject to control,” states lawyer Marat Ashimov regarding the Islamophobic behavior of prison staff.

In September 2020, in Kaliningrad, five Muslim men washed their shoes in the holy spring of an Orthodox chapel, and the process was filmed and posted online, causing an extremely negative reaction not only among Christians in the region. The men were promptly detained and soon released. One of them later apologized for what he had done, recording the video and posting it on social media. Representatives of the Muslim community of the region do not exclude the possibility of provocation against Muslims as well, calling Kaliningrad an Islamophobic region. As a reminder, there is still an acute shortage of mosques there, and last year, there was an increase in social tensions related to the demolition of the prayer house in Chernyakhovsk, which I wrote about in last year’s report.

In November 2020, in Astrakhan, there was a police raid in the area of the Astrakhan mosque. After Friday prayers at the Red Mosque in Astrakhan, law enforcement officers met worshippers at the exit of the temple. Law enforcement officers demanded that Muslims show IDs, while selectively taking worshippers into police buses. The law enforcement officers refused to explain the reasons for the raid. They took Muslims to the police station and after checking their documents, they released them.

Mosque Building Restrictions

Back at the end of 2019, Muslims received a permit from the Yekaterinburg authorities for the construction of a mosque in the Sortirovka neighborhood. Moving to the temporary mosque in the new area was scheduled to September 2020. In January, residents of the neighborhood began collecting signatures to cancel the construction of the Nur-Usman Mosque. Among the main arguments were the transport issue during Muslim holidays, the loud sound of the azan, and the fact that “the proximity to

2. “Tiuremshchiki zadevaiut religiju i natsional’nost’ dlia usileniiia effekta”.
the mosque will badly affect the safety and development of the pupils of the kindergarten, which is located nearby.” Abdul-Kudduss Asharin, the head of the Religious Department of Muslims of the Sverdlovsk region, responded to the claims of the residents of Sortirovka by saying, “Other people’s fears are the worst disease. When any crime happens, they immediately say that it is related to our religion, although these crimes are committed by people who are far from Islam and Muslims.”

In 2020, the Muslims of Rostov-on-Don continued to work to return the historic mosque building to the Spiritual Board of Muslims of the Rostov Region. However, on January 2, 2021, it became known that the building of the former cathedral mosque in Rostov-on-Don was given to a jazz school. The city administration explained this decision by the lack of money in the budget for the construction of a new building for the school.

- Raids in Muslim Cemeteries

In January 2020, there was an attack on a Muslim cemetery in the village of Buraevo in the Republic of Bashkoria. Trees were cut down in the territory of the old part of the cemetery, which destroyed graves as they fell. It is reported that fences surrounding at least five graves were damaged.

In May 2020, 11 Muslim graves were destroyed in the Chernorechensky cemetery in Surgut.

Such deeds are punishable under Article 244 of the Criminal Code “Desecration of the Bodies of the Dead and Their Burial Places” and foresee a fine of up to 40,000 rubles, correctional labor, or imprisonment up to three months.

Employment

Numerous studies show that discrimination in the labor market is primarily related to ethnic discrimination, rather than discriminatory perceptions of Islam. Thus, one can speak with some caution about discrimination against Muslims, but it is mediated by their ethnicity. We are not aware of any specific studies on the marginalization of Muslims in the labor market.

Education

We are not aware of any cases of distortion of the image of Muslims in educational material that would lead to any conflict. However, attention must be paid to framing “Islam as a problem” through a discourse of securitization, of which “spiritual security” as an organic part.

In July 2017, the Research Institute of Spiritual Security and Development of Spiritual Education at BSPU was opened in Ufa and named after M. Akmulla. The vast majority of the events are devoted to the prevention of extremism and terrorism in the youth environment. However, even if Islam is not mentioned in the title of the event, in most cases the agenda is to discuss the problem of an alleged radicalization of Muslims.

Two books by Roman Silantyev, known for his critical stance on Islam, were published simultaneously in 2020: the textbook Fundamentals of Destructology and the popular science version of this textbook named Destructology: How to Lose Money and Health Quickly and Reliably. 10 Steps to Success. In 2019, Silantyev announced the emergence of a new science, namely destructology, and in 2020, he presented the first fruit of his labor. Destructive ideologies are understood as a range of movements from Christian sects to supporters of alternative history, and Islamic extremism is also among them. Moreover, the interpretation of Islamic extremism is extremely broad. For example, Silantyev ironically writes in his popular scientific publication, “To touch the richness of Muslim sects, you don’t have to join the primitive Wahhabi. There are much more original fellows, who will eagerly explain the advantages for one’s health of whippings or offer to take part in building the global caliphate on six acres.” Thus, here we are also talking about considering Islam exclusively in the context of security, which contributes to the stigmatization of the image of Muslims in the public space.

Politics

It should be emphasized once again that due to the special Russian context, the rhetoric of Islamophobia is hardly in demand in the political discourse because of the official discourse of traditional religions, of which Islam is an integral part. Islamophobia thus becomes a consequence of the rigid dichotomy between “good” and “bad” Islam – or, Islam that is loyal and disloyal to the authorities. It is not Islamophobia that forms in the official political discourse and in the discourse of official representatives of the Muslim community, but on the contrary, the concept of “traditional Islam” opposing threats from radical Islam and being loyal to the authorities. That’s why both secular and religious authorities adhere to the rhetoric of traditional values.

For example, the most striking manifestation of this symbolic policy was Vladimir Putin’s meeting with representatives of traditional religions on the relatively new National Unity Day, celebrated on November 4. There, the Russian leader, in addition to reciting three holy texts - the Bible, the Torah, and the Koran - promised a “worthy” celebration of the 1100th anniversary of the adoption of Islam in the modern Volga region and responded to a request from Ravil Gainutdin for the reconstruction of the Moscow Historical Mosque.12

The pandemic, in turn, somewhat altered the rhetoric of the official Muslim clergy in terms of demonstrating loyalty to the authorities. A striking example of this is how Muslims use the theme of celebrating the 75th anniversary of the victory in the Great Patriotic War, which is a very strong indicator of a willingness to be in involved in the political mainstream. Not surprisingly, parallels are being drawn between the victory in the Great Patriotic War and the victory over the coronavirus - united by the metaphor of the plague: “... a full mark of our gratitude will be a categorical prevention of the respread of the brown plague of national and racial superiority, which our ancestors won in that war.”13

Two of the most high-profile events in 2020 stimulated a rise in Islamophobic sentiments in various segments of the media. The first was the murder of French teacher Samuel Paty by Chechen Abdallah Anzorov. However, the Russian conservative segment of the media was not so much affected by the event as by the funeral of Anzorov in his homeland of Chechnya. Particular attention was paid to the “exculpatory” statements of the republic’s leader, Ramzan Kadyrov, and also to the broad support given to the criminal by the local population. Numerous news reports were devoted to how many people went to the funeral, and also to the fact that a street in the village was renamed after him almost immediately. In addition to the violent reaction in social networks,14 condemnations came from public figures as well. Thus, on October 27, famous public figure Kseniya Sobchak called French leader Macron her hero, and criticized statements by the head of Chechnya, Ramzan Kadyrov, for being “medieval.” The anchorwoman also wrote that people were “intimidated by fanatics” into believing that jokes about Islam “can get their heads cut off” and reported threats against her by “people with a Caucasian accent.”15 The media campaign launched in the Russian media and on social networks in connection with the funeral of Anzorov can hardly be called Islamophobic - despite certain statements about the “barbaric nature of Islam,” the main protest was not so much connected to Islam but to the Chechen factor.

Figure 1: One of the comments on the news about the Samuel Paty case on YouTube: “What do you want? This is a great religion, Islam only prefers to execute and generally shed blood because Allah wants it that way. I will prove that there are many ayat in the Quran where it is clearly written that infidels must be killed!”

The second significant event was the report, circulating in the mainstream media, on a fatwa issued by the Spiritual Muslim Department of Russian Federation on the prohibition of marriages between Muslims and non-Muslim women. The document was adopted back on November 19, 2019, and published on July 18, 2020, but it did not become widely known until November 2020. In addition to the intensification of Islamophobic sentiments in social networks when discussing this news, most representatives not only of regional DUMs, but also some ulema in Moscow, spoke against this fatwa.

NEON N.: “Who would marry mentally ill religious fanatics? In Russia we need to eliminate the influence of Islamic traditions on our everyday life and culture of our society. Otherwise, we will raise terrorists.”
Да Ну На: “Apparently everyone has forgotten the story of Varvara Karaulova and other women who traveled for happiness but ended up in ISIS. They had many husbands. Then a Shahid’s belt. Everything according to the law.”
Polovec Pechenegov: “For God’s sake). Let them build more walls around their homes, countries and everything else, because it’s too common that members of their religion like to blow themselves up and cut heads off.”

Finally, among the less high-profile media events but an event worth mentioning is the translation of a short article in the daily conservative online magazine American Thinker (sometimes described as a far-right edition) about the significance of the 14th-century Battle of Kulikovo in Russian history, which drew a fairly enthusiastic response from the Russian audience. The material is a fragment of the book Sword and Scimitar: Fourteen Centuries of War between Islam and the West, in which the author describes Russia’s confrontation with the Golden Horde as a confrontation with Islam. The material was discussed on the platforms of a number of a conservative media.

Justice System

Thanks to the activities of a number of human rights organizations, mass media, and research centers monitoring abuses in the fight against terrorism and extremism and related human rights violations, it is possible to provide an accurate overview of the law enforcement practice of Russian legislation that in some manner criminalizes the activities of Muslims and Muslim organizations. We have identified several groups of measures that to some extent affect the interests of Muslims.

- The Criminalization of Certain Muslim Organizations

1. Hizb ut-Tahrir. By a decision of the Russian Supreme Court, Hizb-ut-Tahrir was declared a terrorist organization in 2003. This decision has elicited a number of criticisms. The main arguments have been that, first, Hizb-ut-Tahrir is a truly radical organization, but it does not use violent methods to achieve its goals. Second, the active struggle that has taken place since its recognition as a terrorist organization has been waged not only against its members, but also against Muslims who have nothing to do with radical activities. Since 2012, the practice of accusing individuals not only of participating in a banned organization, but also of preparing a conspiracy to overthrow the constitutional order in Russia has been added. Since 2014, the number of cases related to participation in the activities of Hizb-ut-Tahrir has increased dramatically due to the persecution of Muslims in Crimea; in Ukraine, the activities of this organization are not criminalized.

According to the SOVA Center, in 2020, about 30 sentences were passed on articles related to the participation or distribution of materials of a terrorist organization banned in Russia. These sentences related to the following articles of the Russian Criminal Code: Article 205.5. Organization of and Participation in the Activities of a Terrorist Organization; Article 205.1. Facilitation of Terrorist Activities, Russian Criminal Code; Article 205.2. Public Calls for Terrorist Activities, Public Justification of Terrorism or Propaganda of Terrorism; and Article 280. Public Calls to Carry Out Extremist Activities. “Terrorist articles” presuppose punishment in the form of long imprisonment (more than ten years and up to life).

2. Tabligi Jamaat has the status of an extremist organization. The religious association was banned in Russia in 2009. Articles relating to extremist activities (Article 282. Incitement to Hatred or Enmity and Violation of Human Dignity; Article 282.1. Organization of an Extremist Community; Article 282.2. Organization of the Activities of an Extremist Organization; Article 282.3. Financing of Extremist Activities) allow for shorter sentences compared to “terrorist articles,” and even include the possibility of receiving a suspended sentence. According to the SOVA Center, in 2020, about 30 sentences were passed on articles related to the participation or distribution of materials of an extremist organization banned in Russia.

3. The activities and followers of the Turkish preacher Said Nursi (Nurdzhular movement) were criminalized. At the end of December 2019, the case of Denis Zhukov, a follower of Islamic theologian Said Nursi, who was accused under Part 2 Article 282.2 of the Criminal Code of participating in the banned organization “Nurdzhular” was dismissed. The decision to dismiss the case was made on the basis of a note to this article, which exempts from liability persons who committed a crime for the first time and voluntarily ceased participation in the organization. Zhukov himself did not agree with this, as he did not admit guilt. In April 2020, Gabdrakhman Naumov, a well-known Islamic activist and lecturer of the Russian Islamic University, was arrested on charges of establishing the Tatarstan branch of Nurdzhular.

- Muslim Literature Ban

Prohibitions of Muslim literature based on their designation as extremist are a fairly common practice by the Russian law enforcement agencies. As of December 2020, the list includes more than 5,000 entries, where not less than 300 are connected with Islam. Lawyers have repeatedly drawn attention to the imperfection of procedural mechanisms in the process of designating materials as extremist. For example, in such processes, the application of the principle of competitiveness and equality of the parties in the proceedings is limited (in such cases, the court is exempt from the need to involve persons whose rights are directly affected as an equal party in the case). A question is raised about the competence of judges who decide on such cases: cases of designating (or not) certain materials as extremist are resolved by district courts at the place of discovery of such materials. Lawyers, emphasizing the particular importance of such cases, speak of the need for a special court at the federal level. One of the most frequent mistakes in such processes is the designation of material as extremist, which is not actually extremist. Such mistakes are quite regular with regard to Muslim literature.

In 2020, there were several cases concerning persecution of dissemination of extremist literature.

In April 2020, the Krasnoglinsky District Court of Samara recognized as extremist a popular tafsir of the Koran in the Russian-speaking space, namely The Interpretation of the Holy Quran. Relief from the Most Gracious and Merciful by Abdurrahman As-Saadi. This is the second time there has been an attempt to ban As-Saadi’s tafsir. On August 7, 2018, the Laishevsky District Court of Tatarstan rejected the claim of the Volga Transport Prosecutor’s Office to recognize the interpretation of the Holy Quran and a collection of reliable hadiths as extremist material. Lawyers intend to appeal against the ban, appealing to violations of the examination procedure.

Other material that became a reason for prosecution is listed below.

- The book The Fortress of a Muslim (a collection of prayers to be recited daily).
- The Book of Monotheism by Muhammad ibn Sulaiman at-Tamimi (Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab) with commentaries by the theologian Abdurrahman ibn Nasir al-Saadi.
- The book Selected Hadith by Sheikh Muhammad Yusuf Kandeelavi.
- The film Wonders of the Quran.

- The book The Personality of a Muslim, As Islam Seeks to Give It through the Qur’an and Sunnah by al-Hashimi.

- Muslim Organization Ban

On May 19, Item 76 was added to the Federal list of extremist organizations. Under Item 76, the autonomous non-profit organization Ak Umut (Bright Hope), a charitable boarding house, was included on the list. The reason for banning the boarding house as extremist was the result of inspections, during which the prosecutor’s office found Islamic literature included in the Federal List of Extremist Materials on its premises.

Internet

There are no projects in the Russian Internet space that systematically utilize the rhetoric of Islamophobia. Single statements can be found on social networks of individual users, but they have no significant political influence.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

Although the figures mentioned in the 2019 report continue to feature heavily in the media, the year 2020 was not marked by any further activities.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

It is worth noting the systematic activities of a number of human rights organizations that monitor human rights violations, including cases of religious discrimination. The information and analytical center SOVA publishes the monthly monitoring Illegal Anti-Extremism, which keeps track of the main and most significant events in the sphere of illegal application of anti-extremism legislation in Russia. The human rights center Memorial regularly updates the list of those prosecuted for their involvement in Hizb ut-Tahrir. The human rights center OVD publishes information on prisoners’ rights and monitors processes connected with Hizb ut-Tahrir and Tablighi Jamaat.

In the conditions of increasing social tension, the statement of the official Muslim clergy about Muslims’ special observance of the quarantine regime, became a kind of response to the Islamophobic statements about the Muslim communities and appeared very timely. He stated, “We heard many times that the huge crowds of Muslims near mosques were caused not by the religious need at all, but by the desire to show force and show their muscles. Today’s event proved the complete invalidity of those hypotheses. On the contrary, we decided to rule out mass participation for the duration of the pandemic, without any outside orders, guided exclusively by Islamic moral principles and the desire to protect society from danger.”

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

While Islamophobia is not part of the official state agenda, there is a flip side to the official discourse of a traditional (Russian) Islam, which emanates from the dichotomy of a “good” vs. “bad” Islam. Islamophobia is entangled with the racialization of migrants and is based on the securitization of Islam. The latter takes on particular significance in light of the criminalization of certain Muslim movements, abuses in countering terrorism and extremism (especially in matters related to Islamic extremism), restrictions on the construction of mosques, and the prohibition of Muslim literature.

Executive Summary

According to the 2020 Freedom House report, Serbia has moved from a “partially consolidated democracy” to a country with a “hybrid regime.” Apart from Serbia, the same decline was recorded in Hungary. The main reason for this negative development is the significant increase in the authoritarianism of the ruling, populist Serbian Progressive Party.

The best indicator of the political climate in the country can be seen in the parliamentary and local elections that were held on June 21, but which were boycotted by all opposition. The elections were held in extremely irregular conditions, also noted by the European Commission. The pre-election process was marked by irregular electoral lists, media blackouts, threats and intimidation of citizens by the ruling structures.

In addition, the parliamentary and local elections were held despite the risk of the COVID-19 virus spreading, resulting in a significant deterioration of the epidemiological situation in Serbia. Shortly after the election, the epidemiological situation deteriorated significantly in Sandzak, which is predominantly inhabited by Bosniak Muslims. The state’s reaction to the rapid spread of the virus in the Sandzak region was completely inadequate. Also, there are indications that authorities systematically covered up and manipulated the real number of deaths from COVID-19 in Novi Pazar, the largest city in Sandzak.

Furthermore, during 2020 and especially during the election campaign there was a marked increase in the activity and visibility of ultra-right groups that were indirectly supported by the regime. Actions directed against migrants were very frequent, as were incidents inspired by ethnic and religious hatred.

Finally, Serbia has continued to be a source of regional insecurity and a center from which anti-Muslim hatred and Islamophobic ideologies and ethnic intolerance is spread.
Izvršni rezime

Kao najprecizniji pokazatelj političke klime u državi mogu da nam posluže parlamentarni i lokalni izbori koji su održani 21. juna i koje su bojkotovale sve opozicionne partie u državi. Izbori su održani u krajnje neregularnim uslovima o čemu je izvestila i Evropska komisija u svom godišnjem izveštaju o stanju u Srbiji. Neregularni izborni spiskovi, medijski mrak, pretnje i zastrašivanja građana od strane vladajućih struktura obeležile su predizborni proces.

Takođe, u predizbornoj kampanji, ali i generalno gledano, tokom 2020. godine došlo je do izrazitog porasta aktivnosti i vidljivosti ultra desničarskih grupa koje su (in)direktno podržavane od režima. Akcije usmerene protiv migranata bile su veoma česte, ali i incidenti inspirisani etničkom i verskom mržnjom.

Na kraju, ono što je takođe veoma važno naglasiti, jeste da je Srbija nastavila da bude izvor regionalne nesigurnosti i centar odakle se šire anti-muslimanska mržnja i islamofobne ideologije, kao i etnička netrpeljivost.
Country Profile
EIR 2020

Country: Republic of Serbia

Type of Regime: Democratic republic

Form of Government: Parliamentary republic

Ruling Parties: Serbian Progressive Party (populist, right-wing party)

Last Elections: Parliamentary elections 2020: Serbian Progressive Party won 60.65%, 188 seats; Socialist Party of Serbia and United Serbia won 10.38%, 32 seats; the electoral list Aleksandar Šapić - Victory for Serbia won 3.83%, 11 seats.

Of the minority electoral lists, the electoral list Alliance of Vojvodina Hungarians - Istvan Pastor won 2.23%, 9 seats; Bosniak Party of Justice and Reconciliation (SPP) 1%, 4 seats; the coalition Albanian Democratic Alternative-United Valley and Alternative of Democracy Shqiptare 3 seats; and the Bosniak Party of Democratic Action 2 seats.

Total Population: 7.03 million (2017)

Major Languages: Serbian

Official Religion: No state religion. The dominant Serbian Orthodox Church and other “traditional” religious communities (Roman Catholic Church, Slovak Evangelical Church, Reformed Christian Church, Evangelical Christian Church, Islamic community, and Jewish community) receive preferential status based on the “Law on Churches and Religious Communities” adopted in 2006.

Statistics on Islamophobia: N/A

Statistics on Racism and Discrimination: N/A

Major Religions (% of Population): Orthodox Christianity (84.59%), Catholicism (4.97%), Islam (3.10%), Protestantism (0.99%), No religion (1.11%), Others (5.24%)

Muslim Population (% of Population): 222,829 people (3.1%) in 2011 (official census). This number is without Albanians who boycotted the census and a significant number of Bosniaks. The reason for the boycott was that there were no questionnaires in their mother tongues. Also, the number of Roma and Ashkali Muslims is much higher, but because of extremely poor conditions they don’t possess any documents so they remain “unrecognized citizens.” The actual number of Muslims living in Serbia is thus estimated at 400,000-500,000.
Main Muslim Community Organizations: Islamic Community in Serbia; Islamic Community of Serbia.

Main NGOs Combatting Islamophobia: There is no particular NGO that deals with Islamophobia. Data is collected and work is conducted by individuals.

- Burka Ban: No
- Prayer Ban: No
Introduction
During the past year, the Republic of Serbia has moved from a state characterized as a “partially consolidated democracy” to a state categorized as a “hybrid regime.”\(^1\) Apart from Freedom House, the report of the European Commission for 2020 stated that Serbia is in a situation where media freedoms are absent, the judiciary is insufficiently independent, and freedom of speech and opinion is significantly endangered.\(^2\) In addition, one of the worrying ongoing trends since 2012, when the right-wing populist Serbian Progressive Party came to power, is the growth and normalization of (ultra) right-wing movements which, with the blessing of the state, often act as “paramilitary phalanxes” aiming to “discipline” all individuals they consider ideologically unsuitable. As a result of these circumstances, the ideology of exclusivist Serbian nationalism in the country has become the dominant political option, as was the case in the 1990s when ethnic cleansing and genocide were committed against the Muslim population in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Kosovo. Apart from the political sphere, the ideology of “Greater Serbian” nationalism decisively influences and shapes the narratives that dominate the public sphere, and as a result religious and ethnic hatred has become ubiquitous and completely normalized due to its impunity.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks
Statistics on hate crimes by the state authorities or by NGOs are still not available. However, it is obvious that during 2020 the activities of right-wing groups were significantly more visible in the public space and in particular, anti-migrant activities were on the rise. Thus, on May 6, a man crashed his car into a migrant center in Obrenovac while he filmed himself and broadcast his actions live on Facebook. The video, which soon surfaced on social media, showed a young man driving a car at full speed into a migrant center shouting “I don’t want my girlfriend to be attacked by migrants... I don’t want a Muslim state... I don’t want to give Orthodoxy to Muslims and I won’t give it to them, believe me!” After he parked the car, he was arrested by members of the Serbian Army which secures the center.

Only two days after the incident, the right-wing group People’s Patrol organized an anti-migrant protest on Republic Square, in the center of Belgrade, where, among other things, they displayed a banner that read “Everything has gone the devil’s way. The Earth stinks of Muhammad.” (Figure 1)

During the year, the abovementioned People’s Patrol “patrolled” Belgrade on several occasions at night, and physically and verbally abused migrants they encountered on the streets. Videos of the protest rally, as well as attacks on migrants, were posted on websites and YouTube channels. On October 25, the same group organized an action called “Let’s clean the park near the Faculty of Economics,” a park where migrants seek refuge. (Figure 2)
Figures 3 and 4: Protests in front of the government of Serbia building entitled “Against the migrants’ invasion.”

The migrant center in Obrenovac was also targeted by the right-wing groups Leviathan, Chetnik Youth, and National Corps, which on May 13 gathered in front of the center and sang The Battle of Kosovo cycle of heroic ballads. Similar to the People’s Patrol, on October 30, the group Leviathan organized a “Hunt for Migrants” on the streets of Belgrade. During the event, members of the group wore Nazi symbols.

Various right-wing groups such as Serbian Action, Leviathan, People’s Patrol, and others attended the protest rally with the slogan “Against the migrant invasion” on March 8. Protesters unfurled a banner in front of the Serbian government building that read “Terrorists not welcome” and “You will not replace us.” (Figures 3 and 4) The flags of Serbia and Greece were visible at the event, and the participants wore Chetnik insignia and badges with the image of Ratko Mladić, who has been convicted of genocide in Srebrenica and other war crimes and sentenced to life in prison. Apart from Belgrade, protest rallies against migrants were organized on February 29 in Subotica (Figure 5) and on November 8 in Šid. There was also a traveling “caravan” of the organization of the Serbian movement Dveri; the van read “Petition against the government’s migrant policy. A signature that guarantees the safety of your children.” (Figure 6)

In addition to anti-migrant rallies, there were two significant incidents during the year related to the denial of war crimes committed against Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina during the aggression of the Republic of Serbia. The first incident happened in the ceremonial hall of the Municipality of Stari Grad, which is located in the center of Belgrade. The municipal premises were rented to convicted war criminal Vojislav Šešelj, president of the neo-fascist Serbian Radical Party, in order to promote his three-volume edition There Was No Genocide in Srebrenica. (Figure 7) On the occasion of this event, a protest statement was released by the Humanitarian Law Center, the Youth Initiative for Human Rights, and Women in Black. Before the beginning of the event, one of the most eminent fighters for human rights and the founder of the Humanitarian Law Center, Nataša Kandić, appeared at the event and was physically attacked by sympathizers of the Serbian Radical Party. As a result of the attack, Kandić was knocked to the ground, after which Šešelj’s supporters forcibly threw her out of the premises of the Stari Grad Municipality.10

*Figure 7: Pamphlet promoting the three-volume edition There Was No Genocide in Srebrenica by Vojislav Seselj, a convicted war criminal.*11

Two weeks after the event organized at the Stari Grad Municipality, the second promotion of the same book followed, only this time at the New Belgrade Municipality, where the Serbian Radical Party was part of the ruling municipal coalition. In response, the Humanitarian Law Center, the Youth Initiative for Human Rights, Women in Black, and the Western Balkans Forum reacted again, asking the authorities to ban this gathering in accordance with the law banning gatherings that violate human and minority rights and freedoms, and which incite religious and ethnic hatred and intolerance. Despite this letter, the police did nothing and the promotional event took place.12

On September 24, following the promotion of Šešelj’s books, which directly deny the genocide in Srebrenica, the Center for Cultural Decontamination hosted the play Srebrenica - When We Who Were Murdered Rise Up, directed by Zlatko Paković. The play was produced by the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Serbia. It was made to mark the 25th anniversary of the genocide against Bosniak Muslims.13 In the last scene of the play, the flag of the Republic of Serbia is shown, on which the names and personal ID numbers of all 8,372 killed in Srebrenica are written, accompanied by a performance of the Serbian national anthem. The play itself passed without incident and due to epidemiological measures was shown to a limited number of people. However, immediately after the play was performed, threats began against Zlatko Paković and all members of the ensemble. The constant persecution, public lynching, and serious death threats lasted for more than three weeks. The authorities took no action whatsoever, while the public media and professional associations in Serbia were completely indifferent. On social networks, Paković was called a “sell-out”, “sick”, and calls for a “public hanging”14 were made.

In a similar manner, only two weeks later, Miša Vacić, the leader of the ultra-right Serbian Right, broke into the exhibition Gateway - When It Hurts, The Truth Is the Cure, which was also held at the Center for Cultural Decontamination. The exhibition dealt with a crime committed by a Republika Srpska Army unit headed by Novak Đukić in Tuzla on May 25, 1995. Đukić was convicted of the crime by a court in Bosnia and Herzegovina but is hiding and living freely in the Republic of Serbia.15 After breaking in and interrupting the exhibition, Vacić took the microphone from the host and shouted “that no shelling took place in Tuzla on May 25, 1995, but an explosive was placed on the square by terrorists.” The narrative “about a set of explosives” is one of the most common ones used by Serbian nationalists to deny this crime.

As in previous years, incidents again accompanied the Mirdita Festival, which was attended by, among others, representatives of the ultra-right group Serbian Action (Figure 8), which used this opportunity to promote anti-migrant messages. On its website, Serbian Action issued a statement against the “Serb-hating festival” and stated, “we will not allow the holding of this ridiculous festival that seeks to promote Shiptar separatism and terrorism; we will not allow the monstrous thesis to be placed in the Serbian consciousness - that Kosovo is a neighbor and not Serbian territory and the legacy of the Serbian people.”

Genocide denial has not remained within the region. In the city of Meinham in Germany, a graffiti glorifying the convicted war criminal Ratko Mladić appeared on a mural dedicated to the Srebrenica genocide, while a symbol “only unity saves the Serbs” was drawn over the Srebrenica flower. (Figure 9)

In addition to anti-migrant narratives and public genocide denials, Pavle Bihalji, the leader of the right-wing Leviathan group, which presents itself as an animal protection organization, reacted on his Twitter account to a photo of members of the Bosniak Justice and Reconciliation Party including Misala Pramenković, the first covered MP in the history of Serbian parliamentarism. Bihalji’s reaction was ambiguous. In a Twitter post, he posted a bomb emoticon and wrote “3,2,1” which can be interpreted either as insinuating that the Justice and Reconciliation Party MPs are potential terrorists who will blow up the assembly or as sending them a death threat. (Figure 10)

It is also important to point out that there were countless social media comments about the news of Pramenković’s becoming a member of parliament, which qualified as the most explicit forms of hate speech and religious intolerance. Despite this, the Facebook pages of media houses didn’t remove any of them. Social media and platforms are a space where we encounter persistent threats to members of religious or ethnic minorities.20

Employment

For many years, salaries in predominantly Muslim regions such as Sandzak or the Presevo Valley have been significantly lower than in other parts of Serbia. Thus, for example, according to the data of the Republic Bureau of Statistics, the salary in the city with the largest and predominant Muslim population in Novi Pazar is more than 13,000 dinars lower than the average salary in the country. Meanwhile the Roma, Ashkali, and Balkan Egyptian communities face double discrimination in employment due to the color of their skin and the fact that they are Muslim. According to Ljuan Koka, director of the Center for Education of Roma and Ethnic Communities, “The problem of discrimination against Roma is clearly visible. There are not enough Roma in the public sector, in places where decisions are made, the private sector, in local self-governments, in social institutions as well as in the health system. Therefore, only the Roma minority - in relation to all other minorities - is represented far below its actual number in the official numbers of the total population in all listed sectors.”

20. For example, in 2020 compared to previous years, the author of this report has been disproportionately threatened on social media because of posts pointing out religious or ethnic hatred. Also, a very good example is the Facebook page of MP Enis Imamović from the Party of Democratic Action, a Bosniak opposition parliamentary party. His posts are very often deeply controversial and advocate ethnic and religious intolerance.

Education

The most important problem in the education sector is that teaching ethnic minorities of the Islamic faith, such as Bosniaks, Albanians, Roma, Ashkali, and Balkan Egyptians, in their own languages is systematically hampered by school institutions. Thus, the problem of books for primary and secondary schools for Albanian children is still unresolved. Also, in the case of Roma, there are primary schools in which more than 90% of Roma students do not have a chance to learn their mother tongue as an elective subject.

In addition, historical revisionism in history textbooks has been at work systematically and over a long period of time, especially regarding the Second World War, where movements led by ultra-Serbian nationalist ideology, which committed mass crimes against the Muslim population in the Sandzak region and eastern Bosnia, are completely distorted.

In addition, an issue that perhaps does not directly concern the education system but refers to publishing world, and what the author of this report has written about, is the fact that books that glorify war criminals are sold in the largest Belgrade bookstores. Such books deny crimes committed during the Serbian aggression of the 90s. (Figure 11)

Informal educational programs organized by the Serbian Orthodox Church should also be scrutinized. The Prizren Spiritual Summer School was held on the territory of the Republic of Kosovo. (Figure 12) The backbone of the entire program was the “Kosovo Covenant”, which is the main pillar of centuries of intolerance of Serbs towards Muslims, i.e. “Turks”, premised on the Battle of Kosovo that took place... between the Serbian army and Ottoman forces in 1389. During the battle, the Serbian leader Tsar Lazar was killed, and very soon after the clash, Serbia fell under the rule of the Ottoman Empire. Lecturers included Srdjan Ratković-Fuchs from Jerusalem Institute for Biblical Studies and Arnaud Goullion, one of the former leaders of the French right-wing Identitaires movement, who is currently the president of the humanitarian organization Solidarity for Kosovo.

Politics

The strategy used by the government in Serbia for several years now is “controlled violence” which is carried out at the behest of the regime. In other words, the regime engages ultra-right wing, hooligan, and neo-fascist groups to create incidents at all events that aim to mark the suffering of Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo during the wars of the 1990s. In addition, although the Criminal Code of Serbia was amended a few years ago, which prohibited the denial of genocide, the prohibition of genocide denial according to the verdicts of the Hague Tribunal was intentionally omitted. In this way, it is possible to continue to deny the genocide in Srebrenica, as well as many other crimes committed during the 1990s.26

In the context of genocide and war crimes, it is important to look at the number of convicted war criminals who took part in the last parliamentary and local elections in Serbia. In fact, a special publication by the Youth Initiative for Human Rights was dedicated to this issue.27 As for the regional level, by persistently questioning the statehood of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the continued non-recognition of the Republic of Kosovo, Serbia is generating a state of smoldering conflict. Direct statements by Serbian government ministers that proclaim that Serbia is working on “uniting Serbs into one state” are common. Such statements represent an unequivocal continuity of the policy that led to wars and mass crimes in the 1990s. Thus, the Minister of Defense of Serbia, Aleksandar Vulin, stated in his interview for the weekly Pečat that “the task of his generation of politicians is to continue the fight for the unification of all Serbs into a single state and political community” (Figure 13). Also, as a guest on a television show, Vulin stated, “The Serbian Army is ready to preserve its combat readiness and to preserve our country and Serbs wherever they are. So, if anyone thinks of invading North Mitrovica or upsetting Republika Srpska, don’t play, we are here. We are safe enough, we have enough people and weapons, everything we need, to protect our country.”28

In the context of the “unification of Serbs,” associations that directly cooperate with the authorities in Serbia continue to organize panels throughout the region to advocate for the creation of a “Greater Serbia”. The best example is the forum called “Awakening of Serbian Unity - Serbia, Republika Srpska, Montenegro” organized in Trebinje. Veroljub Arsić, vice president of the National Assembly of the Republic of Serbia, and Milutin Džukanović, president of the Parliamentary Club in the Montenegrin Parliament of the right-wing pro-Serbian Democratic Front, addressed the audience at a tribune organized in Trebinje, Republika Srpska, on February 29. (Figure 14)

However, the entity which together with the government of Serbia represents the main destabilizing factor in the region is the Serbian Orthodox Church, which, acting across borders, spreads the ideas of radical Serbian “Saint Sava” nationalism.31 Last year, the Serbian Orthodox Church in Montenegro organized months of protests against Montenegrin authorities led by the Metropolitan Bishop of Montenegro and the Littoral Amfilohije Radović (Figures 15, 16, 17). During the protests, which preceded the parliamentary elections, the houses of Bosniak Muslims in the Sandžak region of Montenegro were marked in an organized fashion (Figure 18). After the elections in which right-wing pro-Serbian opposition parties managed to win the majority and thus change the government in Montenegro, anti-Muslim hatred escalated immediately and the mosque in the city of Pljevlja was attacked (Figure 19). The opposition coalition group that received the largest number of votes is composed of (ultra) right-wing pro-Serbian parties that are extremely close to the Serbian Orthodox Church.32

37. The author received the photos from the imam of the Islamic Community of Montenegro.
Furthermore, before the election, the head of the Serbian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Irinej, met representatives of the right-wing pro-Serbian opposition in Montenegro, Democratic Front, Andrija Mandić and Milan Knežević, in Belgrade and gave them “a blessing to fight everywhere and not give up on defending our holy Serbian Orthodox Church” (Figure 20). In a similar spirit, on Christmas Day, Serbian Patriarch Irinej stated that there are no borders between Serbia and Republika Srpska because it is about one nation that speaks one language and everything that has value is common between them.³⁹ Similar to the Serbian Orthodox Church, Bosko Obradović, leader of the clerical-nationalist Serbian movement Dveri, said it was time for a “Serbian mini-Schengen zone” consisting of Serbia, Montenegro, and Republika Srpska.⁴⁰

Media

In 2020, the terrorist attack in Vienna was the post popular topic in the Serbian media. The media especially emphasized the fact that the attacker was an ethnic Albanian, which was used to affirm the narrative of Serbia as a defender of Christian Europe from the “Muslim East”. In addition, as in previous years, regional disagreements, especially between Kosovo and Serbia, were used to spread hatred towards Albanians. There are also publications that speak about the threat to the Western Balkans and Serbia by jihadists returning from the battlefields of the Middle East, or jihadists who deliberately infiltrate migrant groups in order to be in a position to carry out new terrorist attacks in Europe. Moreover, Hagia Sophia being turned back into a mosque caused great media attention and outrage. The media outlets that insist on such narratives are predominantly the tabloids Informer, Alo, Srpski Telegraf, but also newspapers like Večernje Novosti, which are otherwise known for being right-wing. (Figures 21, 22)

---

Apart from the print media, as in previous years, television stations such as TV Happy and TV Pink often invite proven Islamophobes who have been present in the public sphere since the 1990s. The two specific television shows that stand out in terms of their problematic content are “Ćirilica” and “Jutarnji Program” on TV Happy where convicted war criminals and the most vocal proponents of Serbian expansionist nationalist politics regularly appear. As a result, hate speech and slurs directed against ethnic and religious minority communities in Serbia are very often heard.

Justice System

As in previous years, the most important issue is the attitude of the judicial system towards cases related to war crimes committed against Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Kosovo in the 1990s. Regarding this issue, the Humanitarian Law Center issued the publication “Annual Report on War Crimes Trials 2019”. The issue was also pointed out by the European Commission in its annual report on Serbia’s progress. The report points out that the national strategy adopted in 2016 for the investigation and prosecution of war crimes is being implemented at a very slow pace, and that Serbia still has more than 2,500 cases in the pre-investigation phase. Apart from this, no legislation was adopted that would endanger the rights of Muslims in the Republic of Serbia.

Internet

One of the most visited websites in Serbia is the YouTube channel Balkan Info, whose concept is to publish very long conversations with its guests. The topics that are covered mostly concern various conspiracy theories such as Freemasons, Satanists, the Vatican as a center of anti-Serbism, 5G networks, anti-vaccination, the presence of chips in medical masks, hatred of Western countries towards Serbia, globalism, multinational companies, etc. Apart from such topics, during the past year, regular guests included... people who have been promoting notorious Islamophobic attitudes for decades, such as Dževad Galijašević, Srđa Trifković, and Dragoslav Vanja Bokan, as well as ultra nationalist and genocide denier historian Miloš Ković, then war criminal known during the Yugoslav Wars as “Captain Dragan”. A very similar YouTube channel is Helm-Cast, which also has a significant number of interviews related to conspiracy theories, but unlike Balkan Info, they are more focused on the ideological promotion of radical Serbian nationalism, which often promotes ethnic hatred. Novi Standard, another such YouTube channel, for example, hosted Prof. Dr. Darko Tanasković, an academic who insists on Islamophobic attitudes (figure 27) with a special emphasis on neo-Ottomanism (figure 28) and Turkey as a threat to Orthodox Christianity. (Figure 23) There is an interview with Tanasković on YouTube under the title “Erdogan will not give up on the dream of the Ottoman Empire” and an interview on the YouTube channel Sputnik entitled “Hagia Sophia: Erdogan’s challenge to Orthodoxy.” (Figure 24)
Anti-Turkish sentiments are most often used by pro-Russian portals, which also insist on “Christian unity” and Serbia and Austria as defenders against the threat to Europe from “political Islam” or “jihadism.” (Figure 25, left) Texts that refer to the threat to Europe always point out that during the 1990s, Serbia fought against those who sought to create “Islamic states” in the heart of Europe, such as Kosovo, and Bosnia and Herzegovina. (Figure 25, center) Also, these media, without exception, give strong support to Austrian Chancellor Sebastian Kurz in his policy towards Islam (Figure 25, right). The most visible such portals are Sputnik and IN4S.

All of the aforementioned YouTube channels and online portals are also present on Facebook. Apart from them, there are a large number of pages on Facebook that promote exclusivist Serbian nationalism, such as Serbian Honor (Srpska čast), Nationalist, Srbin.info, and many others.

In addition to nationally oriented YouTube channels and Facebook pages, the pro-Western Radio Free Europe, as in previous years, spreads orientalist stereotypes about the Muslim world, especially insisting on portraying Muslim women as disenfranchised and emphasizing the absence of gay rights in Muslim countries. Radio Free Europe also has a Facebook page “Not in my name” which exclusively deals with issues of “radicalism and extremism.” The content shared on this page, as a rule, concerns Muslims around the world and in the Balkan region.

As before, the main generator of Islamophobic policy is the exclusivist nationalist Serbian ideology which for decades has advocated the idea of uniting all those territories where Serbs live in the majority (the case of Republika Srpska) and territories that are perceived as “historical” belonging to Serbia (Kosovo and Montenegro). This ideology, with certain interruptions, represents an absolutely dominant ideological platform in Serbia, which is why it is a constant generator of instability in the entire region. As far as Muslims in the region are concerned, the ideology of “Greater Serbia” has proven to be extremely destructive throughout history, as evidenced by the genocides and ethnic cleansings that Serbs have repeatedly carried out against Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Sandžak, and Kosovo from the end of the 19th century to this day. The main proponents of this ideology are the Serbian Orthodox Church and nationalist-oriented intellectuals who have dominated Serbia in the academic space for decades. Also, due to the fact that the idea of “unity of Serbs in one state” is dominant among the public, all parties on the political scene in Serbia are, more or less, led by this ideology or flirt with it.

On October 15, the Berkley Center for Religion, Peace and World Affairs published a very important article by Prof. Ermin Sinanović, who gives a very concise, but also very substantial analysis of the role of the Serbian Orthodox Church as the most important destabilizing factor in the region. In addition to the generally accepted radical nationalist ideology nurtured by Serbian Orthodox Church, its strength lies in the fact that it has the ability to operate freely across borders and to have direct access and influence on people and territories outside the Republic of Serbia through churches and monasteries.

Serbia and its nationalist policy are constantly supported by Russia, which, in order to realize its geostrategic interests in the region, uses the idea of the “unity and brotherhood of the Slavic and Orthodox peoples.” In addition to the support that Russia provides to Serbia in its policies in the region, there are active relations between Russian and Serbian right-wing organizations. For example, the right-wing organization Serbian Action conducted an extensive interview with Stanislav Voro-biev, the leader of the Russian Imperial Movement, which has been on the list of terrorist organizations in the United States since last year.

Right-wing organizations have been receiving indirect and tacit support since the populist Serbian Progressive Party came to power in 2012, and the government very often uses them in its confrontations with political dissidents. However, the flourishing of the extreme right in Serbia is not only reflected in the protests and excesses these organizations commit with impunity, but also in the fact that they were enabled to participate in the parliamentary and local elections which were held on June 21 despite the COVID-19 pandemic.58

In 2020, there were several events organized in order to paint over graffiti glorifying war criminals or inciting ethnic and religious intolerance. Such efforts were organized by non-governmental organizations that advocate for respect for human rights (Figure 26, left) and by environmentally oriented movements such as “Do not let Belgrade d(r)own.” (Figure 26, right) In March, a valuable study by the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights entitled “Right-Wing Extremism in Serbia” was published, which identified, mapped, and classified ultra-right groups and movements in Serbia.59

Also, during the year under consideration, the Center for Advanced Studies published the book Media Discourse on Islam in the Western Balkans by Harun Karcić and Ivan Ejub Kostić. The aim of the book was to provide an insight into the major drivers and platforms of anti-Muslim hate speech in the media in two Western Balkan countries: Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Serbia.60

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

The non-governmental sector in Serbia faces a very difficult situation because the government and state bodies perceive it as hostile. In addition, due to events around the world and the COVID-19 pandemic, Serbia is not on the list of priorities of international actors in a position to provide assistance to a country like Serbia, which largely failed the post-war transition period of the 1990s and has not faced the crimes from the past.

Due to the above circumstances, non-governmental organizations are largely left to their own devices and as a result, many organizations lack adequate financial resources for successful work. International organizations and relevant actors should keep in mind that Serbia is again in a very difficult internal situation and under the threat of ending up once more under a complete dictatorship. In addition, it is of particular importance that once again the exclusivist nationalist policy of the 1990s has become the dominant narrative in the social and public spheres in Serbia, and that younger generations are growing up with the same myths and ideas that resulted in the most heinous crimes against humanity whose victims were, as a rule, Muslims.

Precisely due to the fact that the “Greater Serbia” ideology’s main target are Muslims, it is crucial for Muslims in Serbia to succeed in involving predominantly Muslim states and all Islamic institutions that can provide them with direct assistance through advocacy, lobbying, and financial assistance, and perhaps most importantly, can offer potential training and education to young people to empower the Muslim community as much as possible.

Executive Summary
The year 2020 has been heavily burdened by the Covid-19 pandemic. Slovenia experienced the first lockdown for 80 days after the pandemic was officially declared on 12 March 2020, and the second lockdown from 18 October 2020, partially ongoing (March 2021). Slovenian Prime Minister Marjan Šarec resigned on 27 January saying his minority government could not push through important legislation. The new, 14th government of Slovenia was formed on 13 March by the president of the Slovenian Democratic Party (Slovenska demokratska stranka – SDS) Janez Janša in coalition with New Slovenia, the Modern Centre Party, and Democratic Party of Pensioners of Slovenia. After the new government of Janez Janša took power, some groups (among them Antifa and Youth Activist Organisation) organised the “Friday Cyclist Protests” in Ljubljana, which started on 27 April and went on every Friday until 23 October. Prime Minister Janez Janša has been accused of eroding the freedom of the media and the press, usurping of power, corruption, and authoritarianism. On 3 February, the first Slovenian mosque was officially opened in Ljubljana and presented to the media, and on 7 February, the first prayer was organised. After more than 50 years, Slovenian Muslims received their first praying space and cultural centre named Muslim Cultural Centre (Muslimanski kulturni center).

Islamophobic discourse was propagated by right-wing politicians (members of the SDS and SNS) and affiliated media (Nova24TV, Demokracija). Nova24TV and Demokracija publicised the statement of SDS member and MP Branko Grims in connection with the discussion on the transfer of exceptional powers to the army to control the Croatian border, who said that the invasion of Islamists (according to him misleadingly called “refugees”) and the SARS-CoV-2 represent a heavy burden for the Slovenian police. In media, Nova24TV newspaper regularly reports and comments about Islam in an extremely negative way, for example stating that “Islam cannot be civilised, integrated, assimilated” and “Islam is the birthplace of violence, psychopathy, and sociopathy”.

Two groups, namely Uprising of Slovenians (Upor Slovencev) and Generation Identity Slovenia (Generacija identitete Slovenija) who have a very strong conservative, traditionalist, anti-immigration, and anti-Islamic stance are no longer accessible via the internet and/or their Facebook accounts. The paramilitary group Styrian Guard (Štajerska varda) and its regional groups/village guards, which formed in 2018 and performed vigilante activities on the borders of Slovenia claiming to offer security and protection from illegal immigrants, have become very active in the last two years. Their leader and organizer is Andrej Šiško, who is also the leader of the Movement United Slovenia (Gibanje Zedinjena Slovenia).
Povzetek

Islamofobični diskurz je bil najbolj prisoten med desničarskimi politiki (člani SDS in SNS) in z njimi povezanimi mediji (Nova24TV, Demokracija). Nova 24 in Demokracija navajata člana SDS in poslanca Branka Grimsa, v povezavi z razpravo o prenosu izjemnih pooblastil vojski za nadzor Hrvaške meje, da invazija islamistov (po njegovem zavajajoče imenovani “begunci”) in SARS-CoV-2 predstavljata preveč breme slovenski policiji. Časnik Nova24TV redno poroča in komentira o islamu na skrajno negativen način, na primer v izjavi, da: “islam se ne more civilizirati, integrirati, asimilirati” in “islam je rojevalec nasilja, psihopatstva in sociopatstva”. Dve skupini, Upor Slovencev in Generacija identitete Slovenija, ki imata zelo močno konzervativno, tradicionalistično, protimigracijsko in protislamsko držo, ni sta več dostopni prek internetnih / Facebook računov. V zadnjih dveh letih je postala zelo aktivna paravojaška skupina Štajerska varda in njene regijske varde / vaške straže, ki so se oblikovale leta 2018 in izvajale vigilante aktivnosti na mejah Slovenije, v imenu ponujanja varnosti in zaščite pred ilegalnimi priseljenci. Njihov vodja in organizator je Andrej Šiško, ki je tudi vodja Gibanja Zedinjena Slovenija.

Introduction

The year 2020 has been, as elsewhere in the world, marked by the Covid-19 pandemic in Slovenia. Slovenia experienced the first lockdown (80 days) during the first wave after the pandemic was officially declared on 12 March while the second lockdown began on 15 October and partially continues at present (March 2021). Measures comprised a ban on movement outside of municipality of one’s residence, compulsory mask wearing, ban of gathering of more than 6 people, and the shutdown of schools, shops, and many workplaces. In 2020, a total of 125,068 were infected by Covid-19 and 2,891 Covid-19-related deaths were recorded. The healthcare system was heavily burdened with lack of intensive care facilities, but more than that, lack of medical staff.

Slovenian Prime Minister Marjan Šarec resigned on 27 January, saying his minority government could not push through important legislation and called for an early election. The governing coalition of five centre-left parties, which took power in September 2018, held only 43 of the 90 seats in parliament and was the first minority government in political history of Slovenia. After losing the informal support of the opposition party Left (Levica) in November 2019, due to disagreements and unfulfilled joint plans, the government has found it increasingly difficult to gain sufficient numbers of votes and get bills through parliament.¹ The new 14th government of Slovenia was formed by the President of the Slovenian Democratic Party (SDS) Janez Janša, who was elected with 52 votes in the National Assembly. The government, which was confirmed on 13 March 2020 was formed by a coalition of the Slovenian Democratic Party, New Slovenia, the Modern Centre Party, and the Democratic Party of Pensioners of Slovenia. The participation of the latter two provoked violent reactions in the media, especially because in the 2018 elections, the two parties assured voters that they would not enter a government with Janša. For this reason, some members of the Modern Center Party quit and protests “against the coalition of hatred” took place in Ljubljana in late February to remind the members of the parliament of their promises.² After its formation, the government took the first measures against the Covid-19 pandemic.

After the new government of Janez Janša took power, some groups (among them Antifa and Youth Activist Organisation) organised the “Friday Cyclist Protests” in Ljubljana. The protests started on 27 April via the initiative of a Facebook group named “Resistance to the government of Slovenia”. The protests went on every Friday until 23 October when further protests were cancelled due to the second wave of the pandemic. The protests were peaceful gatherings of people, mostly on bicycles. Prime Minister Janez Janša and his party have been widely accused of eroding freedom of media and press, usurpation of power, corruption, authoritarianism, spreading hatred and xenophobia, nationalist populism, pressure on judiciary etc. In November, two new groups who are not associated with the Friday protestors, staged street protests and caused violence. The police used tear gas and water cannons during its intervention against these protestors.4

On 3 February, the first Slovenian mosque was officially opened in Ljubljana and presented to the media, and on 7 February, the first prayer was organised. After more than 50 years, Slovenian Muslims received their first praying space and cultural centre named Muslim Cultural Centre (Muslimanski kulturni center).5 The centre was visited by then Prime minister Marjan Šarec and other prominent politicians.6 The architects received the Plečnik 2020 Award, the most prestigious award for architectural achievements in Slovenia.7

Physical and Verbal Attacks

While there are no recorded or reported physical attacks on Muslims, direct and indirect verbal attacks do occur. They mostly take place in various right-wing media, which will be discussed in the relevant section below.

Employment

Compared to previous years there has been no crucial change in the employment field. Muslims still face problems since there is no legal framework (except for the religious rights as protected nominally by the constitution) guaranteeing the actual performance of their religious rights in the workplace (time and place for worship, possibilities of consuming halal food, celebration of Islamic holidays, and religious clothing such as headscarves).

5. This is the first mosque in the history of independent Slovenia; however, on its soil there was a mosque built during WWI (from 1916 until 1920) by Bosniak members of the Austro-Hungarian army in Log pod Mangartom.

Most of the discrimination cases occur in regard to access to social and health services, including social protection and social housing (32%), accompanied by discrimination in the employment area (30%), 10% in educational area, and 28% other areas/cases. According to the last available Annual Report of the Advocate of the Principle of Equality for 2019, the most frequently alleged discrimination on personal grounds in cases recorded in 2019 was gender identity (14%). This is followed by discrimination on the grounds of nationality, race, and ethnic origin (13%). Alleged discrimination on the grounds of disability occurred in 11% of cases, followed by sexual orientation (5%), age (5%), religion or belief (4%), place of residence (3%), social status (2%), language (2%), citizenship of another member state (2%), and citizenship of a third country (1%). The advocate also considered one case of alleged discrimination based on gender identity and one case based on property status (1 case corresponds to approximately 1%).

Education

In March, the Constitutional Court ruled that only the compulsory part of the official school programme, but not the extended programme, should be completely financed from the budget. The Constitutional Court decided on the financing of private schools for the third time in two decades. If in 2001 constitutional lawyers decided that it was not unconstitutional for the state to finance only public schools, constitutional judges in a different composition in 2015 decided – indeed with a close result of 5:4 – that the official programmes of private schools should be funded in the same way as public school programmes. The latest decision of the Constitutional Court makes it clear that the state is obliged to finance only the mandatory part of the official curriculum fully, but not the extended programme of private schools. The extended part of the programme includes supplementary classes, morning care and extended stays, as well as various contents offered by individual schools such as cultural and sports events, or religious and cultural classes and spiritual days at Catholic schools. However, in the educational area, in public schools, Muslims still face similar problems as in previous years.

Politics

Demokracija and Nova24TV quoted the member of SDS and MP Branko Grims in reference to the debate about conveying exceptional powers to the army at the Croatian border of Slovenia (application of Art. 37a of the Defence Act). According to Grims, all those responsible in Slovenia are trying to curb the spread of the Covid-19 virus, while on the other hand thousands of illegal migrants, who are now in Bosnia and Herzegovina, would like to invade our country via the southern border. He sees migrations as threat and states,

The simultaneous invasion of Islamists (who are still misleadingly called “refugees” by many) and the SARS-CoV-2 pandemic pose the impossible task for the Slovenian police of managing all these security tasks at the same time. There are too few of them and they are overwhelmed. The military is in fact already on the border, but it has no authority to actually defend it. The situation is more absurd than you can imagine. At the moment, Slovenian soldiers can defend the borders of Kosovo, but they must not defend the borders of Slovenia.12

The opposition parties SD, LMŠ, SAB, and the Left party opposed the activation of Article 37a of the Defence Act, which would give the army full powers to protect the southern border with Croatia. On 3 March, Zmago Jelinčič Plemeniti, president of SNS, advocated for the necessity of shooting migrants by stating “I think that the country should be defended by all means, sometimes even by shooting... If a policeman is attacked by someone [read: a migrant] with a weapon, a machete or even killed, I hope that policeman next to him shoots. That would be normal in any country. It’s not here yet.”13

The main media outlets publishing discriminatory content are right-wing Nova24TV, Reporter, and Demokracija. On 3 November, an article in Nova24TV, a right-wing media, entitled “Connoisseur of Islam on the Current Situation in Europe: Islam Cannot Be Civilised, Integrated, Assimilated and Is the Same as Anarcho-leftism!” was published.14 As the title suggests, the interviewee, Gregor

Preac, a journalist, publicist, and traveller, stated the following throughout the article:

Ninety per cent of Muslims support the beheading of a French teacher, they have verbally desecrated the beheaded teacher, and protests against France are raging around the world. With 20,000 Islamic terrorist attacks a year, this is further clear evidence that Islam is the birthplace of violence, psychopathy, and sociopathy.

Many theorists of religious and ideological books compare the Qur’an to Mein Kampf in terms of violence. Islam also kills those who renounce Islam, those who insult their families, and those who insult Muhammad, Allah, the Qur’an, in short, it kills all the time.

I have been traveling, living, working around the world and Islam for 33 years, speaking their languages, delving into literature, the lives of Islamic people, writing articles, books, about why there is so much poverty, illiteracy, gender inequality, religions, so much violence in Islam.

The negative consequences of a free migration policy are already strong across Europe: Islamism, terrorism, beheadings, violence, crime, drugs, growing ghettos in major European cities, chaos in the streets, burning churches, and slowly attacking aqueducts and museums, cultural institutions, divisions in society, the rise of hatred, left and right extremism, Islamism.15

He also emphasized that he would like to “help” Muslims to become civilized, so that they can finally reach freedom of spirit, gender, sexuality, thought, art, knowledge, and democracy. He also claimed to be working hard to help the political left and the so-called good Catholics, to tell them about the great deception that Islam represents.

In the article “The Problem of Islamic Fundamentalism” (Problem islamskega fundamentalizma) a very narrow, unproblematised view of rape by Islamic fundamentalists against European women is presented:

Why does rape not seem to be a sin to an Islamic fundamentalist who rapes a European woman in Europe, but can even be a sacred act? If we imagine that an Islamic fundamentalist (who, of course, is not necessarily a terrorist at all) came from an Islamic state, which for him is a land of obedience to God (Dar al-Islam), to a European country that he understands as a land of war (Dar al-Harb), from his point of view, the inhabitants of this European country suffer spiritually because they live immorally and anger the God who will punish them after their death. When an Islamic fundamentalist sees a Western woman dressed in a short skirt and showing her cleavage, he believes she is a very immoral person who dresses similarly to how prostitutes dress in some Islamic countries. From his point of view, the rape of such a woman is therefore not an act of rejection, but an act of rapprochement with his God and even spiritual help to the rape victim, as he may lead her to the right path of morality and a more pleasing life. Such an Islamic fundamentalist would never rape an orthodox Muslim woman. What is written does not mean that all rapes committed in Europe by migrants of the Muslim faith are conditioned by religious belief. It is certain, however, that at least some of them are conditioned by this.\textsuperscript{16}

A column written by Aleksander Škorc (probably a pseudonym) in the newspaper \textit{Demokracija} on 3 December led to a criminal complaint\textsuperscript{17} against the author and editor on the grounds of spreading hatred and racism, however the outcome of the complaint at the court is not clear yet. The article caused sharp reactions from many media outlets, academics and organisations. It stated,

It will therefore happen that migrants will become inexplicably ill and die, as God will create such a microorganism that will not transmit their DNA. It is therefore possible to create such a virus, which only affects certain people, races, groups, in short, people of certain characteristics. Targeted elimination in short. Just as people target certain types of natural pests, mould, weeds, etc., God can target certain types of harmful people. Since the white race is unable to defend itself against the wave of some races, God will create a virus that will save the most advanced race from destruction. So, is God a racist? Just as much as people who exterminate certain animal and plant species that are harmful to them. It is not about racism; it is about cleansing. Weed removal. If you want a good crop, this is a must. ... Jesus was also white. With a reason. He was neither black nor yellow.\textsuperscript{18}

The Slovenian Democratic Party owns part of the publishing house that publishes \textit{Demokracija}. The publication clearly shows that explicit racism is very much present in Slovenian politics and in sections of society, and that the current government is directly connected to the media that publishes such material.

\textbf{Justice System}

At its 21\textsuperscript{st} regular session on 18 June 2020, the Government of the Republic of Slovenia decided that the Council of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia for Dialogue on Religious Freedom should cease to function.\textsuperscript{19} According to the Islamic Community, the Council for Dialogue on Religious Freedom was a body that had no executive power. It was an advisory body that opened some issues that also concern the Islamic Community in the Republic of Slovenia, such as the problem of circumcision, the regulation of school meals without pork, spiritual care in hospitals, the army etc. However, according to the Islamic Community, none of the issues listed have ever been resolved. Therefore, the abolition of the Council did not surprise the Islamic Community and was very much expected.20

Two patriotic/nationalist groups, namely Uprising of Slovenians (Upor Slovencev) and Generation Identity Slovenia (Generacija identitete Slovenija) who have a very strong conservative, traditionalist, anti-immigration, and anti-Islamic stance are no more accessible on the internet. There is no more access to the social media Facebook page of Generation Identity,21 probably as a consequence of Facebook administration banning similar organizations’ accounts across Europe.22 Facebook page Upor Slovencev (The Uprising of Slovenians), while still accessible, has no posts or new uploads in 2020. A Facebook group called Boycott of Products with Halal Certificate (Bojkot izdelkov s Halal oznako), an affiliate of Upor Slovencev, regularly posts cases and products of companies that have acquired halal certification in order for its followers to support the boycott. (Fig. 1) have become very active in the last two years. The so-called Štajerska varda and village guards have regular trainings and gatherings, as well as activities on the internet with their forefront leader and organiser Andrej Šiško, who is also the leader of the Movement United Slovenia (Gibanje Zedinjena Slovenija). The movement has a Facebook account under the name Andrej Šiško – United Slovenia (Andrej Šiško – Zedinjena Slovenija) and maintains the webpage zedinjenaslovenija.si. The paramilitary organisation Štajerske varde is active under the Facebook name Slovenian GUARDS – Civil initiative (Slovenska VARDA – civilna iniciativa).

Andrej Šiško, the initiator of Štajerske varde, claims that parliamentary deputies of left-wing politicians accept laws that allow illegal foreigners and illegal border crossings by immigrants, who commit criminal acts as burglary, robbery, aggressions, rape, and kidnappings. According to Šiško, right-wing politicians are also following in the same steps. He calls them fascists. Šiško negates the existence of the Covid-19 pandemic and claims that there are fewer dead than during two months of the common flu.24 Štajerske varde have become much more active in paramilitary activities in the last few years, wearing army uniforms and carrying weapons. They claim to have the right to self-defence, freedom, and safety.

On their webpage, there is the following picture that depicts Muslims as stuck in gender stereotypes discriminating women. (Fig. 2)

On the political level, parties that openly express Islamophobic ideas belong to the right-wing conservative political spectre. These are the Slovenian Democratic Party (Slovenska demokratska stranka), the Slovenian National Party (Slovenska nacionalna stranka), and the new Homeland League (Domovinska liga). Some of these parties are also connected to right-wing media that spread the same ideological messages, such as Demokracija, Nova24TV, and Reporter. Such messages also on occasion appear in the conservative Christian newspaper Domovina.

Many of the groups that spread Islamophobic/xenophobic discourse were established on the internet during the mass transition of refugees across Slovenia in 2015. Some of these pages are no longer active, such as Uprising of Slovenians (Upor Slovencev), and Generation Identity Slovenia (Generacija identitete Slovenija), while Stop the Islamization of Slovenia (Stop islamizaciji Slovenije) has become a private Facebook group, and Boycott of Products with Halal Certificate (Bojkot izdelkov s Halal oznako) is still active on Facebook.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The NGOs that are active in initiatives to counter Islamophobia in Slovenia are the Peace Institute (Mirovni inštitut), Slovene Philanthropy (Slovenska filantropija), Amnesty International, Society UP Jesenice (Društvo UP Jesenice), ROG Factory (Tovarna ROG), SLOGA – Slovenian Global Action, and PIC – Legal Informational Center. Humanitarian organisations and research institutes that are also part of this network include Humanitas and the Slovenian Migration Institute (SMI). Muslims themselves also try to counter Islamophobia with their activities. There are two main Islamic communities in Slovenia: the Islamic Community in Slovenia (registered in 1976) and the Slovenian Muslim Community (registered in 2006). Recently, in 2018, a third Islamic religious community was officially registered: the Slovene Islamic Community of Mercy (Slovenska islamska skupnost milosti).

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Taking into account the events and the status of Islamophobia in Slovenia, the following policy recommendations are offered:

- Raising awareness of the dangers of hate speech, xenophobia and (neo)racism in the media and on the internet, but especially in politics, since visible and known politicians explicitly use Islam as a reference to fuel their discriminatory discourse.
• Improving the monitoring and collection of information about discrimination based on religious grounds in the employment area, education area, and social area, since there is a huge lack of available statistics, information, and accounts of the difficulties Muslims face in these areas.

• Implementing an official, state-driven legal change for Islamic practices such as praying at the workplace, halal dietary regimes, and circumcision of boys in hospitals to allow for a legal framework that defines and acknowledges these practices as Muslims’ basic rights and needs.

• Facilitating the visibility and participation of Muslims in political, economic, social, and cultural life, as well as in public administration, and supporting mutual dialogue with Muslims in Slovenia.

Chronology

• 03.03.2020: Zmago Jelinčič Plemeniti, president of the SNS, advocated for the necessity of shooting migrants.

• 29/30.03.2020: Member of SDS and MP Branko Grims stated that the invasion of Islamists (misleadingly called “refugees”) and the SARS-CoV-2 pandemic pose an overwhelming burden on the Slovenian police.

• 15.08.2020: Nova24TV presents the argument that the rape of Western women by Islamists is seen by them as an act of rapprochement with their God and spiritual help to the rape victim, to lead her to the right path of morality.

• 02.09.2020: Andrej Šiško, the initiator of Štajerske varde, claims that parliamentary deputies of left-wing politicians accept laws that allow illegal foreigners and illegal border crossings by immigrants, who commit criminal acts as burglary, robbery, aggressions, rape, and kidnappings.

• 03.11.2020: Nova24TV publishes an article in which a journalist claims Islam cannot be “civilised, integrated, assimilated, and is the same as anarcho-leftism”.

Executive Summary

The states of alarm and the measures taken during the confinement from March to June due to the Covid-19 pandemic, have exacerbated the socioeconomic deficiencies and reduced the fundamental rights of Muslim communities. Increased racial profiling by the police has left daunting images of violent treatment towards migrants and other racialized individuals. Despite the absence of a formal, legal prohibition of the hijab, a considerable increase has been noted in the instances where hijab-wearing students were denied access to public high schools at the beginning of the school year in September. In addition, hundreds of minors from the North African cities of Ceuta and Melilla are still being denied schooling. The United Nations have issued another nominal resolution regarding this matter. Of the thousands of unaccompanied migrant minors, only a fraction receives education. Far-right and neo-Nazi movements are on the rise and have organized many demonstrations with hateful Nazi chants and slogans. Some of these demonstrations were in fact “organized hunts” of unaccompanied migrant minors. The historical non-compliance with the Cooperation Agreement signed in 1992 between the Spanish state and the Islamic Commission of Spain has generated the saddest situation experienced so far due to the flagrant lack of space for Muslim burials within municipal cemeteries which during the Covid-19 pandemic became even more evident. In public and political discourse it is observed that mixed hatred towards Muslims, migration, and specifically towards unaccompanied migrant minors has been gradually transforming into a clear Islamophobic discourse since October 2, the date of the French president’s speech on “Islamist separatism,” and following the horrific events in France and Austria.
Resumen ejecutivo

La situación de estado de alarma y las medidas adoptadas durante el confinamiento entre marzo y junio de 2020 debidas a la pandemia del Covid-19 han exacerbado las deficiencias socioeconómicas de las comunidades musulmanas y reducido considerablemente sus derechos fundamentales. Las paradas violentas por perfil racial dejaron imágenes dantescas del trato de algunos agentes de las fuerzas de seguridad a las personas migrantes y racializadas. A pesar de la ausencia de una prohibición legal formal del uso del hiyab, se ha observado un aumento considerable de la denegación de acceso a los institutos públicos a estudiantes con hiyab al comienzo del año escolar en septiembre. Además, centenares de menores ceutíes y melillenses siguen sin ser escolarizados, por lo que las Naciones Unidas ha vuelto a emitir otra resolución nominal. De los miles de menores migrantes extranjeros no acompañados, tan solo está recibiendo educación una parte ínfima. Los movimientos de extrema derecha y neonazis han aumentado y han organizado muchas manifestaciones con sus consecuentes cánticos y consignas de odio. Algunas de estas manifestaciones fueron, de hecho, “cacerías organizadas” contra menores migrantes no acompañados. El histórico incumplimiento de los Acuerdos de 1992 entre el Estado y la Comisión Islámica de España ha generado la situación más triste vivida hasta el momento por la flagrante falta de espacio para los entierros islámicos en los cementerios municipales que, durante la pandemia del Covid-19, se hizo aún más evidente. Se observa cómo el discurso público y político que mezcla el odio hacia los musulmanes, la migración y específicamente hacia los menores migrantes no acompañados, se está transformando paulatinamente en un claro discurso islamófobo desde el 2 de octubre, fecha del discurso del presidente francés sobre el “separatismo islamista” y los posteriores trágicos eventos en Francia y en Austria.

Introduction

According to recent statistics,1 around two million Muslims reside in Spain, half of whom do not have the privilege of Spanish citizenship, making them vulnerable to various forms of discrimination which are unlikely to be reported to the authorities. While national or nationalized Muslim populations are not exempt from discrimination, including violence, non-national Muslims in Spain frequently feel excluded when it comes to housing, employment, healthcare, education, legal aid, freedom of movement, freedom of expression, freedom of association, etc. This gap between Spanish and foreign citizens became more evident during the first state of alarm and the obligatory confinement due to the Covid-19 pandemic (March 14–June 21).2

The most recent report of the National Office for Hate Crimes3 (2019) does not recognize Islamophobic hate crimes and no segregated data on anti-Muslim discrimination is made available by the Ministry of Internal Affairs. Within Spain, only Barcelona’s Office for Non-Discrimination acknowledges anti-Muslim bias.4 Monitoring anti-Muslim racism remains an arduous, volunteer-based, and unsystematic task.

In November, the “Survey on Intolerance and Discrimination against Muslims in Spain,” coordinated by the Secretary of State for Migration through the Spanish Observatory of Racism and Xenophobia (OBERAXE), was published.5 According to the report, Muslims are perceived as the least valued social group along with the Roma. Respondents believe that political discourse (74.5%), terrorist acts (73.7%), and media narratives (70.8%) contribute to the increase of Islamophobia. They maintain there are high levels of Islamophobia in Spain (82.8%), such as when renting a house (87.2%), when accessing the labor market (83.2%), or places of prayer (79.3%). Muslim entities affirm that discrimination materializes in difficulties when settling into a neighborhood.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

Through non-systematic monitoring by volunteers, NGO workers, and the Office for Non-Discrimination in Barcelona, in 2020, 311 incidents were registered, among which there were 49 instances of physical aggression (8 against women, 4 against minors, and 37 attacks on men); 14 cases of vandalism (4 against mosques or other Islamic cultural centers, and 10 in other public spaces); 39 verbal attacks and/or threats (11 against women, 2 against minors, and 26 against men); and 181 discriminatory incidents (25 against Muslims in general, 29 against women, 14 against minors, 111 against men, and 2 against Muslim NGOs).

In September, in Coín (Málaga), two Muslim women were physically attacked while with their children on two different occasions on the same day by the same perpetrators. The attack was accompanied by verbal threats and hijab pulling. After slitting the face of one victim with a key, the perpetrators threatened the victims online in order to avoid prosecution. (Fig. 1) In Lleida, in September, a 22-year-old Muslima was physically and verbally attacked upon leaving her house. A woman pushed, punched, and kicked her, while shouting, “You fucking Moor, go back to your country!”

During confinement, in March, tragic images of a young man of Moroccan origin with a mental disorder in the San Francisco suburb of Bilbao were recorded by a neighbor from her balcony. Basque police officers asked him to identify himself, and arrested the man with excessive force to which he did not resist. When his mother arrived, she tried to explain that her son suffers from a mental health disorder, but she was also beaten by the Ertzaintza agents. (Fig. 2) Both were taken to the police headquarters. A few weeks later, at least two neighbors were fined for recording and disseminating the images on social media. Similar events took place in Madrid, Almendrals, Valencia, Barcelona, and Gerona.

During 2020, several incidents were reported regarding security guards of the RENFE, the state-owned railway company, being physically aggressive towards Muslims and/or migrants, in Alcorcón, Barcelona, and Getafe. In June, a video became viral in which a RENFE security guard breaks the walls of the locker room with his baton and repeatedly shouts (apparently high on drugs) “Blood! I’m full of energy!” To his supervisor, he shouts “Team leader, let’s go! For Spain!” His supervisor answers, “Let’s hope you find a little Moor.” Following the incident, the RENFE published a statement assuring the public that they fired the security guard and downgraded the supervisor who had made the racist comment. During 2020, the instances of neo-Nazi and far-right groups (backed by political and media discourse) chasing minor migrants from the Maghreb became commonplace and were cause for grave concerns. As reported in 2019, thousands of unaccompanied migrant minors (Menores Extranjeros No Acompañados, MENA) experience extreme vulnerability. No exact figures exist of the number of these youngsters in Spain. Since 2019, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child adopted 14 decisions against Spain for violating the rights to identity, to be heard, and to special protection of children deprived of their family environment. When becoming 18, they are expelled from institutional premises and end up squatting wherever possible. According to SOS Racisme Catalunya, European countries usually do not consider migrant youngsters as children. Their racialization strips them of their childhood, leading to their criminalization and institutional abandonment. Neo-Nazi groups organize on social media to “hunt MENAs.” The chain events that took place in October in the San Blas neighborhood of Madrid, show how both neo-Nazi and mainstream media manage to project a completely different story. A newly formed neo-Nazi group called Bastión Frontal promotes the constant harassment of unaccompanied foreign minors in Madrid and even encourages neighbors to exercise violence against them by spreading hoaxes, like the one accusing minors of raping a 13-year-old girl in a nearby neighborhood, though the alleged rapist was Spanish.

27. Miquel Ramos y Dani Domínguez, “El presunto violador es español: se desmonta el bulo que sirvió como excusa a los neonazis para atacar a los menores migrantes en San Blas”, La Marea, 16 October 2020.
On the night of October 13, several men intimidated minors in their home. A police patrol avoided a confrontation.33 Later that night, four people, one of them a young Moroccan, clashed with two neo-Nazis (Bastión Frontal).34 Later, one of the latter needed medical assistance. The next evening, some hundred people, including Bastión Frontal, gathered again at the home of the minors chanting “not a fucking MENA in San Blas! Madrid will be the grave of the MENAs”35 while shouting to the police, “Where were you while they were being raped!?36 All minors were urgently relocated. National newspaper El Mundo, among others, published quite a difdifferent story, titled “Demonstration in San Blas against the ‘MENAs’ After the Brutal Attack Suffered by Two Neighbors and the Increase in Robberies.” The residents immediately condemned the intrusion of neo-Nazis in their neighborhood, calling for a demonstration in support of the migrant minors two days later (attracting many supporters). The president of the San Blas neighborhood association explained, “Bastión Frontal members are not even from our neighborhood. These minors are living here for about 1.5 years and the area’s security did not worsen because of them, but due to the lack of police.” The Spanish Immigration and Refugee Assistance Network reported this persecution of minors to the Prosecutor’s Madrid Office. Vox backed the neo-Nazi attack by tweeting on October 16: “They are neither children nor are they fleeing wars.” Similar organized persecutions of migrant minors and youngsters have occurred throughout 2020 in Premiá de Mar (Barcelona), Llansa (Gerona), Los Nietos (Cartagena), Sant Andreu (Barcelona), and Mogán (Gran Canaria).

In February, during carnival in Ceuta, a “chirigota” (typical street performance group) sang a couplet with openly racist content aimed at Muslims and Amazighs: “Xenophobia is not part of my mind, but it touches the balls, you cannot imagine that the Moors are coming on so strong […] Once they become civilized and learn how to ask, they’ll have rights.” The song also insulted the deputy of Caballas, a local political party. This had happened before in 2006, when the winning “chirigota” was condemned for insults against the Muslim community and paid a fine in order to avoid penal prosecution. Some of the singers present in 2006 also participated in this group. On February 28, around 6,000 people marched in Ceuta “For Social Harmony and Against Racism,” the largest demonstration in Ceuta in recent years. (Fig. 5)

On September 25, a graffiti was found on a building in Premià de Dalt (Barcelona) stating, “Kill an Arab.” Someone published a picture online tagging the City Council, who answered, “Good afternoon. For your information, it is a private property. Therefore, the City Council has no power to act as it concerns a private matter. Thanks.” However, according to the local Coexistence and Citizenship Ordinance, the municipality must erase any discourse inciting hate against any minority. Later, someone replaced the word “kill” with “kiss.” (Fig. 6)

Employment

In January, a young woman started her nursing internship in a private medical center in Igualada (Catalonia). After a week she was told, “We are very pleased with your work […] but you have two options: either you take off your hijab or you cannot continue here.” The trainee nurse requested the internal norms, which were not provided. She was warned “not to make any trouble.” Fortunately, the University of Lleida, where she was studying, published a statement condemning the medical center and providing the student a new place to finalize her internship with a hijab.

In 2020, two judgements brought to light the conditions faced by Muslims in the security forces. A sergeant was condemned by the Second Territorial Military Court of Seville for a physical and verbal attack against a Muslim soldier that occurred in August 2019 in Melilla. The shouts by the sergeant included, “You are a Moor, and you shouldn’t wear those military clothes.” The soldier had to receive medical assistance due to the beating. Military justice also condemned the superior to six months in prison for abuse of authority in the mistreatment of a subordinate. A.B.H.A., a civil guard, made a complaint about an interview he had undergone during the selection procedure to obtain the rank of officer, in 2015. According to A.B.H.A., he had been asked almost exclusively about his religion. The disciplinary measures following this claim, included the loss of 15 days of salary (he was considered to have lied), and a monthly suspension from work (for failing to respect his hierarchical superiors). However, the Military Chamber of the Supreme Court annulled both sanctions considering them a “violation of the fundamental rights to freedom of expression, defence and the sanctioning legality.”

In September 2020, a farm manager was arrested for at least 20 sexual assaults on irregular Moroccan rural workers in Murcia. The trade union explained to the Civil Guard that “if they [the Moroccan workers] didn’t sleep with the manager, they wouldn’t work. Sometimes, he would force them physically.” According to Civil Guard sources, the investigation remains open regarding other possible aggressions. Similar sexual assaults and labor exploitation of migrant workers were reported as having occurred in the strawberry fields of Huelva in 2018 (e.g. the case which involved 17 Moroccan women); no trial has yet been held.61 To understand how certain labor becomes racialized and gendered, researchers Fatiha El Mouali and Salma Amzian explain,

Moroccan women pick the strawberries, not the men, since the Spanish colonial imaginary has built us as submissive and obedient beings. It is necessary to understand that, for these jobs, mainly women are hired from rural and impoverished areas, without a formal education and younger than 45 years, leaving minor children in Morocco. All this to subdue and exploit them more easily and to make sure they do not run away […] Only a comprehension of how race, class, and gender intertwine in the modern colonial order, will help us to understand the structural violence occurring in the Andalusian countryside, exerted by the state and its institutions.62

Education

In September 2020, NGO G-Chime registered 12 cases in different regions of Spain of young women who were denied access to high school for wearing a hijab,63 an increase from previous years. Most schools have established internal rules. Apart from the data recorded by G-Chime, a 16-year-old student in Santander, was not allowed to enter Alberto Pico High School wearing a hijab and received humiliating comments in front of her schoolmates. Written rules were not provided, but verbally she was told, “You cannot wear hats or hoodies in class.” Another student (Barajas High School, Madrid) had the courage to record a conversation last October with the school management. Their arguments included: “You cannot wear any headgear […] due to internal norms […] It’s like if parking is not allowed and you want to park your car inside […] or if you want to use your mobile in the classroom. It is a norm […] There are youngsters who want to come in sweatpants, they can’t.” Another student was denied access in the Prado de Santo Domingo High School (Alcorcón, Madrid), which is the second time that this school denies a Muslima her right to education.64 Researcher and journalist Youssef Ouled states, “These three schools promote themselves […] as inclusive spaces that respect diversity and promote multiculturalism, which, as we see, does not materialize regarding the identity, integrity, and personal dignity, the freedom of conscience, nor the ideological, religious and moral conviction of these young women. What we observe is a flagrant violation of their right to equality, dignity, religious freedom and free access to education, among others.”65 An instance of best practice in this regard was the 2017 resolution of the Valencia Department of Education prohibiting public schools from denying access to education to minors wearing a hijab or kippah, among other religious signs.66

In 2020, hundreds of minors from the North African Spanish cities of Ceuta and Melilla are still waiting to start school. In February, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child ordered the access of an 11-year-old girl to school “in order to prevent irreparable damage.”67 In October, a few days after she started school, she was notified by the Melilla City Council that she had been deregistered from the civil registry and could not continue her schooling.68

Unaccompanied minor migrants are also denied their fundamental right to education. To understand how this denial of rights occurs, one can examine the political discourse referring to these minors. For example, Carlos Verdejo, spokesman for Vox Ceuta and representative in the Ceuta Assembly stated in a plenary session on the right to education for migrant children: “Bringing the MENA into our schools, with our children, with our nephews! Including the MENA in formal education […]! Is that what we want?”69 Spanish legislation on the improvement of educational quality insists on the principles of normalization and inclusion, as well as non-discrimination and effective equality in access and permanence in the educational system.70

The Catalonian Department of Education created a pilot plan regarding Islamic religion in public schools in Barcelona, Baix Llobregat, Girona, and Tarragona for the academic year 2020-2021.71 The president of PP Catalunya and deputy mayor of Tarragona, Alejandro Fernández and the far-right Vox publicly ignore the 28-year-old legislation which grants Muslim children the right to receive Islamic religion classes in public schools, if requested by a minimum of 10 families per school.72 Currently, only 1 in 10 Muslim children have access to Islamic religion classes at their school.73 (Fig. 7)

Politics

Per the 1992 Cooperation Agreement between the state and the Islamic Commission of Spain, Muslims have the right to a space in cemeteries for Islamic burials. For decades now, Muslim communities have been trying to negotiate the creation of such a space. According to the Union of Islamic Communities of Spain, in 2019, only 35 of the 8,131 Spanish municipalities provided a space for Islamic burials. Usually city councils and administrations wrongfully understand that Muslims will be buried in their country of origin, despite being Spanish and/or born in Spain. During the pandemic, some city councils started to negotiate with the local Muslim communities to habilitate such a space. Several Muslims were buried in conditions that were against their final wishes.

Two of the six Vox representatives in the Ceuta Assembly left the Vox parliamentary group following racist WhatsApp messages made by party officials.80 The leaked conversations include comments such as “We are going to swallow the Moors by the balls”, “The Third World War will be against Islam”, and “Fighting militarily in Ceuta if the political battle fails.” The local MDyC party reported these messages to the Prosecutor’s Office. Ceuta’s Court of Instruction 5 closed the case considering these messages as “isolated expressions.” MDyC’s spokesperson, Fatima Hamed, announced an appeal to the Provincial Court.81 Vox Ceuta has also tried to cut the funding for NGOs such as Intercultura Ceuta and Digmun, whose objectives include intercultural activities, assistance to women and children, and Darija and Spanish language classes. While trying to cut the funding, the party has been smearing these entities and the Caballas local political party.82 After 11 months of social and political tensions, the right-wing PP party broke its agreement with Vox.83 Other political parties are trying to present a motion to expel the party from the vice presidency84 due to their systematic hatred against the Muslim population, which stands at 40% of the local population.

In July, Silvia Orriols, former president of far-right and independentist Front Nacional per Catalunya (FNC), currently an independent councilor in Ripoll, had to appear in the city’s Investigative Court 1 for an alleged hate crime against the local association Annour.85 In a plenary session in January, Orriols demanded the prohibition of an opening of a new mosque, accusing Annour of “indulging in religious fanaticism” and of “discriminating against women.” Previously, she had accused Annour of involvement in the 2017 terrorist attacks. (Fig. 8)

On October 12, “Día de la Hispanidad” (Hispanic Heritage Day), approx. 400 people gathered in front of the Columbus statue in Barcelona, following the call made by far-right Somatemps and Vox. The event began with the blessing of an image of Our Lady of the Pilar, the patron saint of the Hispanic world. Videos show how the gathering ended with the neo-Nazi group Frente Nacional Identitario burning the Catalanian (unofficial) flag and chanting the fascist anthem “Cara al Sol”, shouting “Heil Hitler”, “Long live Franco”, and “Jose Antonio Primo de Rivera” (founder of the fascist party Falange Española).86 (Fig. 9)

Media

When Muslim women appear in mainstream media, they are often bullied or expected to talk about terrorism. One example is the short documentary titled “Spanish [female] Jihadists in Limbo”89 broadcasted during prime time on public television, and considered appropriate for audiences of 7 years and older. According to the program description, the film is about “48 Spaniards who traveled to Iraq and Syria to join the so-called Islamic Caliphate. 12 were women. Informe Semanal interviewed three of them and a Moroccan widow of a Spaniard.” The documentary constantly links

Islam with terrorism, portraying practices like “stoning” as Islamic. Such television programs often rely on the same “pundits.”

A young Muslim activist, N.B., a former EU elections candidate for the left-wing party Podemos, was invited to speak about feminism on the daily television program “Espejo Público.” She joined from outside the studio and was rarely given a moment to speak while those inside the studio were plaguing her. Writer Lucía Etxebarría shouted to her,

What does not seem right to me is that you are defending this with a jimar [sic] […] while there are women who are getting 23 years in prison and 148 lashes for wearing a veil [sic] […] You cannot wear a symbol of oppression which is your fundamentalist version of Islam. So, if you take off the veil, we talk […] and you are attacking your Muslim sisters who are killing themselves, who are enduring jail, whipping, everything to defend not wearing a veil. If you sometimes appear with a veil and sometimes without, then I would say “well, okay, you can choose,” but you always appear with a very particular veil, it is not just any veil […].

This pressure on N.B. was also felt by other Muslim women who witnessed the “debate.” (Fig. 10) The following days, Etxebarría and her femonationalist followers continued to harass N.B. online.

Newspapers often publish articles mixing “radicalization” and spirituality. On May 9, El Independiente published the article, “The End of Ramadan in Full De-escalation Puts Internal Affairs on Guard” where it stated, “CITCO [Center for Intelligence against Terrorism and Organized Crime] advocates to ‘intensify surveillance’ in municipalities with ‘religiously radical’ Muslim communities which […] call to gather the faithful.”95 (Fig. 11) However, no festivities took place for Eid al-Fitr and most of the Eid al-Adha celebrations were suspended.96

French President Macron’s speech on October 2 on “Islamist separatism” and the subsequent terror attacks in France and Austria had an impact on Spanish media and their discourse on Islam and Muslim communities. Journalists of different media currents seem to have united. Lately, national newspapers like *ABC*98 and *La Razón*99 publish at least one article on “Islamic terrorism” or “jihadism” nearly every day. (Fig. 12)

A lawsuit was filed in Seville against the newspaper ABC by four Muslims regarding their right to protect their image and honor following a news item related to terrorism which included their image in April 2019. Despite the modification of the image following complaints, hundreds of people retweeted or shared the photo and the original news on their social networks (including Vox president, Santiago Abascal) with racist and Islamophobic comments, placing these persons “in a clear situation of danger” since the first publication obtained “a large-scale diffusion” according to the lawsuit.

Justice System

Different state authorities seem to equal terrorism and violent radicalization solely to “jihadism,” while ignoring other kinds of terrorism. This tendency feeds the narrative that “not all Muslims are terrorists, but all terrorists are Muslim.” Both the annual National Security Reports and the updates of the National Strategic Plans against Terrorism and the National Strategic Plan to Fight Violent Radicalization by CITCO perpetuate this association by constantly using words like “Jihadism”, “DAESH”, “Foreign Terrorist Fighters”, etc. and completely omitting terms like the “far-right”, “neo-Nazi”, etc. As part of the Plan to Fight Violent Radicalization, the authorities collaborate with “[g]roups at risk or vulnerable to the threat of radicalization.” The plan states, “Cooperating actors will be the groups directly affected by the development of the Plan. Once the ideology that sustains the threat listed as a priority has been determined in the first Management Plan, the risk groups or the most vulnerable groups that are affected by it will be identified. The incorporation of these groups into the created structures will be facilitated, through qualified individuals and/or representatives.” Muslim communities are often requested to be present at these meetings as “group at risk”, while far-right radicalization seems to be ignored, though present online, in the media, and on the streets, and constituting a clear menace to national security. This double standard is evident when comparing the outcome of similar actions depending solely on the perpetrator’s perceived religious identity.

Last September, in Lleida, the police discovered preparations for a terrorist attack “like the one in New Zealand” by two white supremacists.\textsuperscript{107} According to the head of the Catalan police, “these two detainees admired - and planned to emulate - Brenton Tarrant, the perpetrator of the murder of 51 people in Christchurch […] considering themselves ‘anti-system’ because they claimed that Western governments in Europe were weakening white families by favoring the immigration of people from North Africa. They had four Telegram channels. In one of these, chats included almost a thousand subscribers.” Within these group chats, manuals were shared for making explosive devices and homemade weapons. (Fig. 13) One user had initiated procedures to acquire firearms and another reported he already had them. It was finally treated as a hate crime and Lleida’s Criminal Court 4 released the two detainees with charges.\textsuperscript{108} In December, within the same operation, two other men were detained in possession of weapons in Ronda (Málaga) and Pamplona (Navarra).\textsuperscript{109} Similar cases occurred in Almería,\textsuperscript{110} in Alfarrasí\textsuperscript{111} (Valencia), and in the city of Valencia.\textsuperscript{112} (Fig. 14)
There is a clear tendency among certain security forces and judiciary to use hate crime legislation not only to protect minorities, but to protect perpetrators of aggressions and threats against minorities, such as neo-Nazi groups and individuals. \textsuperscript{118} Circular 7/2019 \textsuperscript{119} of the State Attorney General’s Office, signed by the former State Attorney General, María José Segarra Crespo, made this clear. A lawyer from law firm Red Jurídica stated, “I’m concerned that the Circular cites Nazism as an example of a political ideology worthy of protection, when it is precisely this ideology that advocates hatred against all the groups mentioned in the circular. [It] perverts the spirit of hate crimes.” In October, the hate crime database Crímenes de Odio was published by journalists David Bou and Miquel Ramos, experts in far-right groups and hate crimes. \textsuperscript{120} The collected data follow the OSCE-ODIHR standards, \textsuperscript{121} and do therefore not include “ideology” which is protected in the Spanish Penal Code (SPC). The SPC defines “ideology” as “any fact that indicates the existence of a motive of hatred or discrimination towards the victim due to their conception of aspects related to politics, social, economic and cultural system.” \textsuperscript{122} As a result, ideology has been used to protect neo-Nazi individuals as victims of hate crimes. \textsuperscript{123} The aforementioned database exposes “101 cases with 103 fatalities since 1990 motivated by hatred or whose perpetrators were linked to extreme right-wing groups or ideologies.”124 This research confirms that most murders that fall under the category of a hate crime have never been taken to trial or the perpetrators have been acquitted.

Internet

In October, the report “Disinformation, Religious Minorities and Hate Speech”125 was published by Maldita.es,126 a non-profit media outlet that focuses on fake news, misinformation, and public discourse through fact-checking techniques and data journalism. This report identified and analyzed misinformation about religious minorities in Spain between 2017 and June 2020. Out of 141 fake news stories on religion, 100 were related to Islam or Muslim culture.127 Half of them were about immigration. Fake news linking Muslims to terrorism is frequent: 30 news stories were related to violence and terrorism. According to the Institute for Conflict Studies and Humanitarian Action (IECAH), misinformation about Muslims and terrorism is very much related to language: “When a media outlet says that Islamists killed someone, it links this act with millions of people who practice Islam.”128

Harassing Muslim women online is becoming a habit, especially between February 1 (World Hijab Day) and March 8 (International Women’s Day). In 2020, an online campaign was launched before March 8 by the femonationalist current analyzed in the report for Spain for 2019.129 Their slogan “Go out without veil, you are not alone”130 and the tags #8MSinVelo, #SinVelo (without veil) and #FreeFromHijab went viral. They project foreign contexts and legislation on the Muslim communities in Spain and even hold them responsible for them. (Fig. 15) As a result of not feeling supported by other women, many Muslim women (with and without the hijab) did not join the March 8 demonstrations, either out of fear or indignation. Videos of the small group of Muslimas who joined the march became viral and were disseminated by individuals from different political currents generating online hate speech.131

Far-right disinformation websites, such as Mediterráneo Digital, Diario Patriota, Alerta Digital, Caso Aislado, Euskalnews, Periodista Digital, OK Diario, etc., strongly contribute to the far-right social movements. Other smaller media outlets generated within the abovementioned femonationalist current, regularly promote hatred against Muslims and Islam while actively rallying for the exclusion of visible Muslims from public space. Among the politicians who regularly use and spread anti-Muslim rhetoric are the Vox members mentioned throughout this report, including the party’s EU member of parliament, Herman Tertsch, and Manuel Valls, a member of the Barcelona City Council and president of the Barcelona pel Canvi party.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

Rights International Spain (RIS) and the Implementation Team of the International Decade for People of African Descent in Spain (IDPAD) carried out the study “Racism, Xenophobia and Police Brutality during the State of Alarm in Spain” in cooperation with several anti-racist civil society organizations. The research is based on the review of incidents and reports, semi-structured telephone interviews with victims of racial discrimination, and an online survey. Its results show over 70 racist incidents.

and institutional discriminatory practices, 45% of which refer to violations affecting a particular group. Madrid is the region with the highest number of complaints (40%), followed by Catalonia (21%), and the Basque Country (8%). Those identifying as Black and/or Afro-descendants (32%) suffer the largest number of aggressions, followed by Arab Muslims (30%), Roma (25%), and Latin Americans (8%). Data collected by SOS Racismo Madrid documented 13 cases of racial profiling by the police of people purchasing basic goods between March 15 and April 7. The provoked fear led to further self-isolation. The online survey shows that over 70% of the respondents subjected to racial profiling additionally suffered police violence.

The Office for Non-Discrimination of the Barcelona City Council works for the protection of human rights, fighting against all types of discrimination in Barcelona since 1998. It offers socio-educational action services, legal advice, psychosocial care, and conflict resolution, including in cases of Islamophobia through the Barcelona City Council’s Municipal Plan to Fight Islamophobia.139

NGO SAFI (Associació Stop Als Fenòmens Islamòfobs) recently launched the Observatory of Islamophobia in Catalonia (ODIC).140 Apart from addressing the lack of data on anti-Muslim hatred, its main objective is to centralize and monitor all Islamophobic events that occur in Catalonia by preparing annual reports based on the collected information.

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Institutions must acknowledge anti-Muslim racism and include anti-Muslim bias in annual reports on discrimination and hate crimes. Further to the recommendation of UN Rapporteur on Minorities,141 a census that recognizes ethnic-racial diversity should be generated, guaranteeing identity, self-ascription, and anonymity to have more precise information which is necessary to design better-targeted, effective, and evidenced-based government policies and programs, and to measure the impact on marginalized communities. Civil servants should apply the existing codes of conduct regarding the treatment of minorities and minors. Equality bodies should advocate for the inclusion of Muslim women with hijabs in employment and education. The exhaustive revision of educational textbooks regarding Islam, Muslims, the Islamic Spanish heritage, migration, and the recent material on “Terrorism in Spain” is necessary. Human rights should be included in the mandatory school curriculum. The fundamental right to education, as included in the Spanish Constitution, should be applied to all minors residing in the Spanish state. Racial profiling should be made illegal and objective empirical data, including ethnicity and nationality, should be used. To prevent underreporting, officials must assist in the filing of reports in the case of crimes against minorities and should not start a process of expulsion should the victim be in Spain irregularly. Muslim communities should be able to access specialized legal aid permanently and without obstacles, as most of the reported issues could be resolved with the existing legislation.

Masoud Kamali is a professor of Social Work, Sociology. He worked at Uppsala University and Mid Sweden University in Sweden until 2019. Currently, Kamali is the scientific leader of the research and consulting organization “Incare Sweden AB.” As a result of his research and engagements in the questions of discrimination and social justice, Kamali was appointed by the Swedish government as the head of the “Governmental Inquiry into Power, Integration and Structural Discrimination” between 2004 and 2006. The results and suggestions of the inquiry have resulted in many anti-oppressive changes in Swedish social policy and in the national educational system. Appointing Kamali as the head of a governmental inquiry was a historic event in Sweden since historically all governmental inquiries have been led by political scientists with a Swedish background and not by scholars from the field of social work with an immigrant background. His appointment was also a result of Kamali’s leadership in the major international research project “The European Dilemma: Institutional Patterns and Politics,” funded by the European Union (2002-2008).

Kamali has extensive research experience and publications in the field of social work and sociology with clear global perspectives on current social problems, such as neoliberalism, war, violence, forced migration, inequalities, and racism and discrimination. Executive Summary

Sweden enjoys an international reputation as a welfare state, a democracy, and a country with a high level of tolerance. This is, however, a myth which is increasingly weakening in the face of the country’s widespread structural and institutional racism and anti-Muslimism. This report shows that the normalization of anti-Muslim racism in the Swedish political spheres and media has led to the reinforcement of structural and institutional racism and discrimination against Muslims in the Swedish labor market, the justice and education system, and the housing market. Physical and symbolic violence against the Muslim minority in Sweden has dramatically increased in the last years. Increased marginalization of Muslims, which in recent decades has gained an urban geographical seat in the form of marginalized housing areas, is the consequence of a structural and institutionalized anti-Muslim racism that has put the country’s social cohesion at risk.

Anti-Muslim racism is not only a chronic problem in Sweden, but also a violent ideology which leads to physical attacks on individuals who are, or are supposed to be, Muslims. This report shows that recent racist attacks in Sweden and other Nordic countries, such as Denmark and Norway, have been greatly influenced by anti-Muslim ideologies and sentiments that are being spread by racist political parties, such as the Swedish Democrats, and the mainstream mass media. The presentation of Muslims as an “enemy within” and Islam as the “religion of the enemy” is not only an act of anti-Muslim and racist extreme right parties and organizations, but also of many mainstream parties, mass media, and public organizations, such as universities and municipal authorities. Since racism has historically had a religious undertone against non-Christian groups presented as the “others”, anti-Muslim racism must be addressed in order to be counteracted. The report concludes with some suggestions for action to fight back and reduce anti-Muslim racism in the country.

- Hijab Ban: No - depends on local decision. In some municipalities, such as Skurup, in which the right-wing alliance under the leadership of the SD is a majority, there is a veil ban.
- Halal Slaughter Ban: No
- Minaret Ban: No - depends on local decision. In some municipalities where the SD is the majority party, there is a minaret ban.
- Circumcision Ban: No
- Burka Ban: No
- Prayer Ban: No - depends on local decision since some municipalities where the SD is the ruling party, there is a ban on prayer in the workplace.
Introduction

The normalization of anti-Muslim racism in the Swedish political spheres and media has led to the reinforcement of structural and institutional racism and discrimination against Muslims in the Swedish labor market, the justice system, the education system, and the housing market. This is however, not only a Swedish problem: a number of reports show that structural racism and discrimination against Muslims is growing across entire Europe.¹

Since racism has historically had a religious undertone against non-Christian groups categorized as “others,” anti-Muslimism as a prominent form of racism must be addressed in order to be counteracted. The increased marginalization of Muslims, which in recent decades has gained an urban geographical seat in the form of marginalized housing areas, is the consequence of a structural and institutionalized anti-Muslim racism that has put social cohesion in the country at risk. Muslims are no longer “foreign” groups located in distant lands but are part of the Swedish society and make up a substantial body of its citizens. The fact is that they exist “here and now” in Sweden but they are exposed to structural, institutional, and individual racism and discrimination that prevents them from fully participating in society. This means that equal rights for everyone in Sweden does not apply to the rights and opportunities afforded to Muslims.

The structural and institutional contexts of anti-Muslimism must be highlighted and counteracted through short-term and long-term policy measures that promote integration and reinforce democracy and social cohesion in society. The fact that we live in global societies, where the global has become local and the local global, means that we can no longer regard Muslims and other Swedes with an immigrant background as “isolated elements” and enclaves that exist “among us.” Social cohesion, our future, and global peace and coexistence depend on today’s political actions. We need political leaders who take responsibility for the good of everybody and do not divide people into imaginary groups of a “modern and democratic ‘We’” and a “non-modern and undemocratic ‘Them’” that contradict each other. Islam is a Swedish reliigion and Muslims are part of the notion and the reality of “Swedish people.” Social cohesion is possible only if the political system guarantees everyone’s human rights and works for social justice, and equal rights and opportunities for everybody irrespective of ethnicity, religion, nationality, gender, and other dividing categorizations.

Racism against Muslims has been a building block in the construction of the “modern and democratic West.” However, hostility to Muslims and Islam did not diminish with the disappearance of the Crusades, but took on new forms and was also made “scientific” and presented as “the clash of civilizations,” where the postcolonial “West” must continue its colonial “civilizing mission” to civilize Muslims. The occupation of Muslim countries, and the demonization of Muslims and Muslim countries cannot, therefore, be called anything other than anti-Muslimism.

Recent racist attacks in Sweden and other Nordic countries, such as Denmark and Norway, have been greatly influenced by anti-Muslim ideologies and sentiments. The Swedish antiracist organization, Expo, has studied the strong connection between extreme right movements in Nordic countries, called the “Alternative Right” (Alternativhöger), and has showed that such movements and organizations have a strong anti-Muslim ideology. Further, the Alternative Right has substantial ideological and organizational ties with both established racist parties, such as the Swedish Democrats (SD) in Sweden, and with Trumpism in the USA.2

The presentation of Muslims as the “enemy within” and Islam as the “religion of the enemy” are not only the actions and the production of anti-Muslim and racist extreme right organizations, but are also a part of the policies of many established mainstream parties, mass media, and public organizations, such as universities and municipal authorities.3 During the course of 2019, many mainstream parties in Sweden started to normalize the anti-Muslim and racist party SD and declare their willingness to cooperate with the party in future. The Moderate Party leader, Ulf Kristersson, started the party’s cooperation with the SD by inviting its leader Jimmy Åkesson to lunch.4 The Christian Democrats’ leader, Ebba Busch, did the same.5 This is a development that should alarm all groups and organizations of the scrambling fascism in the country as well as in other western and even non-western countries.6

I have written elsewhere that the crusades against Muslims, Muslim countries, and Islam never stopped, but their shape changed and was modernized. It should also be said that this has nothing to do with the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 and that the crusades have been in effect during the entire process of modernization, colonialism, and postcolonialism. Anti-Muslim racism is an established policy in Sweden by which many employees, civil society activists, politicians, and journalists with immigrant backgrounds are forced to either leave their positions and activities or adjust themselves to the policies of anti-Muslimism. Those who deny their Muslim and migrant background seem to be welcome in what is called “the warm circle of Swedishness” and can keep their positions. Those who try to keep their dignity, religion, and critical views are increasingly excluded from “Swedishness” and marginalized. Anti-Muslimism is spreading in western countries, including Sweden, by the “normal functions” of the institutions of education, the justice system, the housing market, mass media, and a democratic system which increasingly adopts open anti-Muslim racism.

Statistics on hate crime in Sweden are collected and presented by the governmental organ known as the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention (Brå) every two years. For this reason, the latest available statistics at the time of writing this report were from 2018. The following figure illustrates the course of hate crime towards members of the Muslim community in Sweden between 2008 and 2018. It must, however, be considered that the figure shows only the anti-Muslim hate crimes which have been reported to the police.

As one can see, the number of reported hate crimes against Muslims has risen from 327 in 2013 to 562 in 2018. Figure 3 illustrates the comparison between different kinds of hate crimes which have been reported to the police between 2008 and 2018. The figure clearly shows that hate crimes with anti-Muslim motivation are the second-largest category of hate crime in the country.

However, the fact that the figures concerning the hate crimes reported to the police are much smaller than the real numbers of hate crimes make the rise in the number of hate crimes even more worrying. As a new study by the Swedish center for opinion studies Novus shows, one-tenth of Swedes have been subjected to hate crimes in 2020. The study shows that although the number of hate crimes is increasing, the real numbers cannot be seen in the statistics of the hate crimes reported to the police.

What is more, there have been several other serious accidents and crimes with anti-Muslim motives which added to the difficult situation of Muslims in Sweden.

Burning the Quran

Two Danish racists, the so-called artist Dan Park and the Danish extreme right politician Rasmus Paludan applied to the Swedish police in the southern city of Malmö, where many Muslims with immigrant background live, to burn the Quran in the front of the Rosengård Mosque on August 28, 2020 at 12.00. The police initially told the press that they were going to give Park permission. Eik Åberg, the head of the police department in Malmö, told the press, “Our standpoint right now is that we are not going to completely deny permission.” However, the police later refused to grant them permission fearing confrontations with Muslims. When the police stopped the planned Quran burning, Park stated, “It is completely crazy. It shows that Sweden surrenders to Islam.” However, Park and Paludan received permission to burn the Quran elsewhere in Malmö. This event took place on August 28, 2020 and was participated by Danish and Swedish anti-Muslim groups. As a response, Muslim and marginalized youths demonstrated, which turned into riots in Malmö.

The anti-Muslim groups under the leadership of Paludan continued their provocations in order to encourage confrontations between Muslims and the police as part of their desire to encourage crusades between the white Christian majority and the Muslim minority in Sweden. This is, of course, a well-established program which has been planned and is being conducted in many European countries. After Malmö, Paludan applied for permission to burn the Quran in Stockholm. The Quran burning was to take place in the nine marginalized areas of Botkyrka, Fittja, Alby, Tensta, Rinkeby, Akalla, Husbys, Sollentuna, and Upplands Väsby on Saturday, September 12. The police denied him and his anti-Muslim colleagues permission on the grounds that the action and demonstration would gather more than 50 persons which is the limit for legal gatherings during the Covid-19 pandemic. Thus, the police decision was presented as having nothing to do with the anti-Muslim nature of the proposed event but was based on the governmental restrictions concerning the pandemic.

Given the long history of anti-Muslimism and the growing anti-Muslim attitudes and sentiments in Sweden, one cannot be surprised by the police’s decision and motivation. The anti-Muslim actions and attitudes that take place publicly in Sweden are always motivated by the “defense of freedom of speech.” However, there are laws and rules that can be perfectly applied for hindering the public acts of anti-Muslimism in Sweden. Among such legal means is 16 § of the Swedish Criminal Code (Act 1991:240) which makes it clear that “[a] person who makes noise in a public place, or otherwise behaves publicly in a manner liable to arouse public indignation, is guilty of disorderly conduct and is sentenced to a fixed fine.” However, it seems that such codes are applicable only when the rights of majority Swedes are violated.

Attacks on Mosques

Attack on mosques have been increasing in Sweden in recent years. This is a sign of the growing anti-Muslim sentiments and enmity towards Muslims and Islam in the country. A study conducted in 2018 based on a questionnaire given to 167 Muslim organizations and associations with their own mosques in which Friday-prayers are regularly held shows that a large group of mosques have been the target of physical violence.

The veil bans

The question of the veil has been a debated subject in the post 9/11 era in Sweden. It was not only the racist and anti-Muslim parties, such as Swedish Democrats (SD), who campaigned for a veil ban, but also some mainstream parties, such as the Liberals. The increasing anti-Muslimism and racism which has led to the electoral success of racist parties and programs, encourages many established parties to adopt a more populist anti-Muslim stance and programs. In August 2019, the party ideologist for Sweden’s second-largest party, the Moderate Party, Gunnar Strömmer, launched an investigation aimed at forbidding the veil in Swedish schools. It was published in the Swedish tabloid Aftonbladet in order to gain support by anti-Muslim groups.19 The action was even supported by anti-Muslim members (some with immigrant backgrounds) of other mainstream parties.

A well-established political model in Sweden is the use of individual politicians with immigrant backgrounds for launching and implementing anti-immigrant and anti-Muslim policies. There are many such politicians in different Swedish parties, such as Nalin Pekgul in the Social Democratic Party, Hanif Bali in the Moderate Party, and Nyamko Sabuni in the Liberals. These influential individuals are in favor of a veil ban for Muslims in Sweden. Hanif Bali, an MP for the Moderate Party, is one of the most known anti-Muslim politicians with an immigrant backgrounds in Sweden. On November 1, 2018, he tweeted, “The veil is a negative symbolism” and that “it stands for the honor culture and systematic oppression of women.”20

Nalin Pekgul, an MP for the Social Democratic Party and the head of the party’s women’s association, has criticized Muslims several times for terrorism, radicalization, and oppression. She published an article in the daily newspaper, Göteborg-Posten, on August 7, 2016 accusing Muslims for forcing the veil on their women and children by “brutal methods.”

Nyamko Sabuni was elected the leader of the Liberal People’s Party in 2019 and has a long track of anti-Muslim propaganda and political actions. In 2006, prior to becoming minister of integration in the Swedish right-wing alliance government in November 2006, she declared that “all Muslim girls should be gynecologically examined in order to find out if they have been circumcised or not” and that “the veil should be prohibited in schools.” In her first interview after her election as the party leader, she stated, “The vision of a multicultural society must be buried.” In an interview with Swedish Channel 4, she stated that the “veil is problematic” and that “religious schools must be forbidden.”

Figure 7: Nyamko Sabuni, the leader of the Liberals, claiming on television that religious schools should be forbidden.

The veil ban has also been an important electoral slogan and propaganda for the SD. The party has presented several suggestions to forbid “anything which has to do with Islam.” Among such anti-Muslim efforts are the party’s suggestion in Kungsbacka county, Gothenburg (Göteborg), in August 2018, to forbid “all cloths which can be related to Islam” and the implementation of a veil ban in Staffanstorp and Skurup, two municipalities run by the SD.

The increasing anti-Muslimism has gone so far that those with Swedish and non-Muslim background who resist such anti-Muslim efforts are subjected to threats and harassments. A principal of a school in Skurup, Mattias Liedholm, who resisted the politicians’ veil ban decision received death threats by anti-Muslim and racist groups.31

Researchers who criticize anti-Muslimism are subjected to hate crime. For example, when a researcher from Lund University - along with 22 other researchers - criticized the anti-Muslim report by the Swedish Civil Contingencies Agency (MSB) with the title Muslim Brotherhood in Sweden for reinforcing negative attitudes against Muslims in Sweden, he and his family received death threats.33

The veil ban is going to be an important question in the next parliamentary election since the majority of the mainstream political parties are increasingly adjusting themselves to the new anti-Muslim popular discourses.

Employment

Although the updated Swedish antidiscrimination law (2008:567) is in effect since 2008, many research reports in recent decades have shown that Muslims, in general, and Muslim women who wear a veil or other religious cloths, in particular, are subjected to discrimination in the labor market.34 A report from the Swedish Equality Ombudsman (DO) shows that in 2018 a total of 2,567 reports of discrimination were sent to the DO. Among those, 146 cases concerned discrimination in the Swedish labor market and education system because of the applicants’ religion. The majority of reports concerning discrimination are from Muslims or those considered to be Muslims.35 Although there are no explicit statistics on the casual relation between religion and discrimination in Swedish official statistics, many reports indicate the widespread discrimination of minorities based on their religion. A research conducted by the European Social Fund (EFS) concerning discrimination in Sweden in 2017, concluded that “[e]thnic and religious minorities are subjected to discrimination in the Swedish labor market, both in the process of application for employment and at their working places.”36 The report claims that applicants’ and employees’ birthplace, religion, and name are the main reasons behind employers’ negative attitudes towards them.

A European report concerning the discrimination of Muslim women in the Swedish labor market, which was based on interviews with Swedish Muslim women, organizations, and stakeholders, concluded that discrimination of Muslim women, or what the author of the report calls “gendered Islamophobia” undermines Muslim women’s access to economic, political, and social equality.37 A study of legal cases at Swedish courts concerning discrimination shows that many veiled women and girls are discriminated against in the Swedish labor market.38 Muslims, both women and men, are discriminated against in different ways. Employers reject Muslim applicants based on their Muslim names. Many studies from 2007 to 2018 have shown this problem in the Swedish labor market.39 The latest report from the Institute for Evaluation of Labor Market and Education Policies has shown that applicants from Muslim countries, such as Iraq and Somalia, are discriminated against compared to applicants with a Swedish background and further discriminated compared to non-Muslim applicants.40 For instance, Muslim applicants have 30 percent less chance to be called for a job interview than Christians, and are more discriminated against compared to both majority and minority societies.41

ISLAMOPHOBIA IN SWEDEN

Education
A governmental inquiry into racism and discrimination in 2006 showed that discrimination against immigrants, in general, and Muslims, in particular, is an integrated part of the Swedish school curriculum. Increasing anti-Muslimism and the mainstream political parties’ movement to the right have influenced the interest in research on anti-Muslimism in the Swedish education system. The discussion about anti-Muslimism in Swedish schoolbooks has moved on to the question whether ‘Muslim schools’ should exist. The SD presented several suggestions to the Swedish parliament aimed at passing a law that would make all Muslim schools in Sweden illegal. Although such a law did not get enough support in parliament, the mainstream parties – the Social Democrats (ruling party), the Liberals, and the Center Party – made an agreement to forbid the establishment of new religious schools. This decision in reality was aimed at forbidding Muslim schools in the country.

Politics
The climate of the political debates in the Swedish public sphere has dramatically changed since the 1990s. The neoliberalization in Sweden has gone much faster and deeper than in many other European and even Nordic countries, such as Denmark, Finland, and Norway. This has led to increasing socioeconomic gaps and inequalities.

The rapidly increasing income inequality and the reduction of the redistribution of resources in Sweden have led to the growing socioeconomic, political, and cultural marginalization of many people with immigrant background, including the country’s Muslim population. In addition, in the last decades, the country’s historical anti-Muslimism, shared with many other western countries, has led to the increasing discrimination of Muslims in the Swedish labor market, housing market, justice system, educational system, mass media, and political system.

The intense framing of Muslims as “culturally deviant”, “non-Swedish”, “foreign” and “others” helped the new racist and anti-Muslim party Swedish Democrats (SD) to gain a considerable electoral support and enter the Swedish Parliament.

Both Åkesson and other party members have tried to single out Muslims and Islam as a “danger” and a “foreign invasion” that threaten Swedish society. In an article, Åkesson wrote, “We Swedes have been naive about the immigration of Muslims to Sweden.”

The party’s racist attacks and its dehumanization of Muslims have been an inseparable part of its political debates and programs ever since its appearance on the Swedish political scene in the 1990s. Yet, in the last years, the party’s anti-Muslim at-
Attitudes, which are frequently reported in the press, have become harsher and more overt. In 2014, the SD politician Robert Quiding stated that “I will discriminate Muslims, and Islam should be forbidden in Sweden.”\(^{49}\) Another SD politician, Martin Strid, said that “Muslims are not completely human.”\(^{50}\) One of the parties that are losing their anti-Muslim votes to the SD is the Liberal People’s Party, which is at risk of not making the requirement for entry to parliament (at least 4 percent of the votes) in the next election, scheduled for 2022. In order to counteract this, they recently elected Nyamko Sabuni, a known anti-Muslim politician with an immigrant background, as their party leader. Out of fear of being forced out of parliament as a result of decreasing electoral support, the Liberals sought popularity by engaging in anti-Muslim and anti-immigrant policies.\(^{51}\) Sabuni is trying to convince all parties (except the SD and the Greens) to make a deal on migration.\(^{52}\)

According to the polls published in the press, the question of migration is one of the most important questions for the Swedish public. This is partly because both Sabuni and the SD related many problems of marginalization and criminality to immigration, in general, and immigration from Muslim countries, in particular. Immediately after her comeback and her election to the post of the party leader, Sabuni declared her anti-immigrant and anti-Muslim plans. In an interview with the Swedish tabloid \textit{Expressen} on June 6, 201, she stated, “The vision of a multicultural society must be buried” and “Fewer must be attracted to Sweden and those who lack asylum reason must be immediately deported to the countries they come from.”\(^{53}\) In the same interview, she defended an anti-Muslim report titled \textit{Rosengårdssrapporten} (The Rosengård [a marginalized neighborhood in the southern city of Malmö] report) that was written by the famous anti-Muslim researcher from the Swedish Defense Institute, Magnus Ranstorp, in 2009. The report, which was highly criticized by many independent researchers in Sweden and was called a “scandal,”\(^{54}\) was requested by Sabuni, who was integration minister at the time.

Recently, in an interview with Swedish Television AB, the Swedish national public broadcaster, Sabuni answered the question of cooperating with the racist and anti-Muslim party SD and said, “I am ready and will cooperate with all parties who are ready to work with us for the implementation of our policies.” In the same interview, she opened up about cooperation with the SD in the next election. She stated, “We have to have several balls in the air.”

Sweden is witnessing a growing cooperation between three right-wing parties who are trying to attract the Liberal party to join them before the next election. The three parties, called the “Blue-Brown Alliance” (referring to a right-wing and fascist ideology) are the Moderate Party, the Christian Democrats, and the SD. All three have overt anti-Muslim attitudes and according to the latest opinion poll (September 2020) constitute circa 46 percent of the Swedish electorate. If the Liberals under Sabuni’s leadership join the alliance, they will seize political power in the next election as the following figure which shows the result of the September 2020 poll indicates.

In the case of a possible future victory of the Blue-Brown Alliance, the anti-Muslim government will reinforce anti-Muslimism - an unprecedentedly devastating development for the Muslim community in Sweden. At the moment, there are examples of what such a political power can do. In the municipalities where such an alliance has already been formed and where it holds political power, for example the municipality of Bromölla in southern province of the country, among the first decisions was the prohibition of prayer during working time.

A Swedish governmental inquiry into the role of mass media in the country concluded that mass media is the third power center in Sweden and has close connections with the first and the second power centers, i.e. the economic and political powers. This means that Swedish mainstream media have close ties to the Swedish political parties and are used by the parties to disseminate their ideas and give them popularity. In reality, the increasing influence of mass media equals the increasing influence of political parties and market actors.

Although there were a couple of limited publications concerning the problem of racism and Islamophobia in Swedish mass media during the 1990s and early 2000s, the question of racism and anti-Muslimism in media was first seriously discussed in 2006 in a governmental inquiry. The inquiry entitled Power, Integration and Structural Discrimination, led by the author of the present report, explored the role of mass media in demonizing and otherizing Swedish migrants, in general, and Muslims, in particular. Several reports in the governmental inquiry dealt with the (miss)presentation of Muslims in Swedish mass media. However, the Swedish mass media ignored the problems of racism and anti-Muslimism and, as usual, became engaged in a process of self-defense and “putting the blame on the victims” that still continues. The media’s self-defense strategy aimed at legitimizing its role in stigmatizing migrants, in general, and Muslims, in particular.

58. Ibid.

A report on the mass media reporting on Muslims in Sweden, published by the group Nyans Muslim in 2019, shows the continuation and in some cases even harsher discrimination against Muslims in the media. According to the report Muslims and Islam in the Media, 2018, during 2018, Swedish mass media published 64,681 articles in which the words “Islam”, “Muslims” and “Islamism” appeared. The author of the report, Amanj Aziz, writes that the figure excludes reports and articles about Daesh or the so-called Islamic State. The report concludes that an average of 177 articles were written about Islam and Muslims on a daily basis in Sweden and that the majority of the articles were very negative.63

The Swedish media has a history of racism and anti-Muslimism.64 The most known anti-Muslim media figures are Per Gudmundson, the author of the editorial of the Swedish daily Svenska Dagbladet (SvD); Hanna Kjöller, author of the editorial of the Swedish daily Dagens Nyheter (DN); and many other journalists working in the major Swedish dailies, such as Sydsvenska Dagbladet (published in Malmö, a city with one of the largest Muslim populations in Sweden) and Göteborg-Posten (published in Gothenburg, the third-largest Swedish city) whose editor in chief Alice Te- odorescu is known for her anti-Muslim ideas. Anti-Muslimism has been normalized and attacks against Muslims are almost part of daily media reporting. The Swedish public service, TV, and radio, are not an exception. On October 25, 2020, 39 Swedish journalists with immigrant backgrounds who work or had worked for the Swedish Radio (SR), published a protest letter in the major Swedish journal, Dagens Nyheter (DN), against racism at the SR. They signed a six-page-long testimony about the ways they were subjected to racism in the Swedish public service media.65 In their letter, they wrote,

The opinion about how black Americans are treated can be seen on the surface as foreign news. This is just half of the fact. Not to see the parallels (notwithstanding differences) to the systemic discrimination of and racism against blacks and other racialized Swedes is to fail in its journalistic mission, something we believe that the Swedish Radio in many ways does – has failed. We have all experienced the editorial laziness in listening to Afro-Swedish voices, shortcomings in organized and multifaceted reporting of this subject in Sweden and the lack of the “sense of urgency” about such a question that is shaking the entire world.

A few days later, on October 25, other journalists with immigrant and Muslim backgrounds working at the Swedish Television (SVT) supported their colleagues at the Swedish Radio and pointed out the severe problem of racism at the SVT. Although they do not explicitly mention systemic discrimination of Muslims at the SR, they pointed to a major problem in Swedish media.66

A well-known Swedish phrase from the 1800s states that “the only real protection for the poor is the law.” A justice system that protects the poor, minorities, and victims against criminal offenders is highly depended on two pillars: the clarity of laws against crimes, hate crimes in this case, and a proper police investigation that can provide a basis for a court decision. Therefore, the justice system is highly depended on the police’s investigation of crimes. However, there are two major problems in the process of the police investigations of hate crimes or other crimes related to anti-Muslimism. The first is the lack of willingness on the side of the police to label such crimes “hate crimes against Muslims.”67 Swedish research concerning the shortcomings of police investigations of hate crimes against Muslims or what researchers call “anti-Muslim racism” shows that when there is not a proper investigation of such crimes and the police mislabels hate crimes as something else, the judiciary has no chance of bringing the offenders to justice.68

The law on the freedom of religion was introduced in Sweden in 1951, but in reality, it was not examined until the Muslim migration to Sweden which occurred later. Its implementation is not clear and often faces many difficulties since the concept of ‘freedom of religion’ remains vague in many senses.69 Discrimination against minorities, in general, and Muslims, in particular, has been observed by researchers and resulted in a report from the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention (Brå) which showed that discrimination against such groups occurs frequently in the Swedish legal system.70 Discrimination against minorities and Muslims occurs both in the process of police actions and investigations, as well as in Swedish courts. A study from 2017 showed that being stopped and searched by the police is a common experience for people with Afro-Swedish, Roma, and Muslim backgrounds. They are stopped by police while driving, walking, or being in public spaces, and are treated as potential perpetrators.71 Another study reinforces this study by showing that Swedish police discriminates against visible minorities, including Muslims, based on routine procedures, established working methods, and informal profiling based on stereotypes.72

Figure 12: A picture published in the Swedish press showing a Muslim man in a mosque who is presented as a leader of a criminal clan.73

The increasing anti-Muslimism and hate crimes against Muslims in combination with the passive reaction and the discriminatory actions of the justice system have forced the Swedish Muslims in Cooperation Network to report the crimes against Muslims and other minorities and the passiveness of the Swedish judiciary to the United Nations Human Rights Committee (OHCHR) in 2018. The report says that the passivity of the Swedish judicial system in fighting against and preventing hate crime have led to Muslims' very low confidence in the Swedish justice system and in the Swedish Equality Ombudsman (DO).74 A research report by the Segerstedt Institute at Gothenburg University shows that the policies of countering radicalization and terrorism focus generally on Muslims and view Muslim organizations in Sweden as responsible for jihadism and terrorism.\(^{75}\)

In August and September 2020, a harsh debate on “gang criminality” dominated the Swedish media and political sphere. The main figures of the debate were politicians and representatives of the Swedish racist party, SD, and the police. The Swedish police chef, Mats Löfving, claimed that there are 40 clans whose members are criminals.\(^{76}\) Although the police report about clans included many different groups, the debate mainly concerned “clans with roots in the Middle East” - a notion which is often used to single out Muslims. The Swedish tabloid, Expressen, reported on the “clan criminality” mentioned by Löfving by publishing a picture of the so-called clan leader Hashem Ali Khan preaching in a mosque.\(^{77}\)

Internet

The European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) sees a growing use of the Internet by extreme right-wing groups for spreading hate propaganda in all European countries.\(^{78}\) This trend continues. Already in 2015, the European Commission had declared that hate speech against Jews and Muslims was increasing on the Internet; however, nothing was really done since then.\(^{79}\) There are reports from the 2010s that confirm that the Internet had become a major place for disseminating hate and racism against religious minorities, such as Jews and Muslims.\(^{80}\) Even the Swedish government declared that the Internet is the most important forum for spreading hate and negative attitudes against Muslims.\(^{81}\) The organization Näthatshjälpen (Help against Internet Hate) also indicates that the most common hate speech on the Internet is Afrophobia and Islamophobia.\(^{82}\)

A report from the Swedish Muslims in Cooperation Network shows that the Internet is a common place for racist attacks against Muslims. The Internet is a place where negative images and stereotypes of Muslims are widely communicated and disseminated. The network reported this to the UN Human Rights Committee and asked for their intervention to counteract the Swedish government’s passivity in eliminating hate against Muslims on the Internet.83

An examination of several anti-Muslim and racist Internet sites shows that such groups are not only using real individuals, but also robots for the spread of hate against Muslims and other migrant groups. The author of an article in Neheter 24 (News 24), Jonathan Lundberg, writes that robots which are engaged in racist social media sites demonize Muslims and people with migrant background by spreading fake news. He wrote that fake news and accusations against Muslims and people with immigrant backgrounds are spread on the Internet and help to reinforce anti-Muslim racism in the country. Many such racist and anti-Muslim sites, such as Avpixlat, Fria Tider, and Exponerat, closely cooperate with leading figures of the anti-Muslim and racist party SD and try to influence the Swedish electorate to vote for the party.85 Many anti-Muslim and racist groups in Sweden hope that the SD will soon become the largest party in Sweden and gain even more influence in Swedish politics. According to the Swedish government and the Swedish Security Service (Säpo), anti-Muslim attitudes and propaganda have been increasing in the country, in general, and on the Internet, in particular.86 This has caused the Swedish government to give the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention the responsibility of examining the anti-Muslim attitudes in the country.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

The following are central figures in the Islamophobia network in Sweden:

- The anti-Muslim political party Swedish Democrats (SD)
- The anti-Muslim party, currently not represented in parliament, National Democrats (ND)
- The leader of the Liberal People’s Party, Nyamko Sabuni
- The MP from the Moderate Party, Hanif Bali
- The politician from the Swedish Social Democratic Party, Nalin Pekgul
- The leader of the Christian Democrats, Ebba Bush
- The leader of the Moderate Party, Ulf Kristersson
- A MP from Left Party, Amina Kakabaveh. She is excluded from the Left Party because of her overt anti-Muslim attitudes but is still an MP.
- The editorial staff of the following major dailies: Svenska Dagbladet (SvD), Dagens Nyheter (DN), Göteborgs Posten (GP), Sydsvenska Dagbladet, and Uppsala Nya Tidning (UNT).
- The think tank OIKOS connected to the SD.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

The Swedish government has shown concern about the increasing anti-Muslimism among right-wing extremism in Sweden. Although the government is unable to see its own responsibility and the role of the mainstream parties in the legitimization of anti-Muslimism, it cannot ignore the dramatic increase in anti-Muslimism, which if continued can create a security problem for the country. That is why, as mentioned earlier, the government has given the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention (Brå) the responsibility to study anti-Muslimism (labelled “Islamophobia” by the government) in Sweden.87 However, most initiatives to counter anti-Muslimism come from civil society actors with Muslim backgrounds. Among such initiatives are the following:

- Muslim Youths of Sweden (SUM). (SUM) is an Islamic organization of young Muslims in Sweden that is comprised of about 40 Muslim associations and numbers about 5,000 members. The organization is highly active in combating anti-Muslimism. It organizes courses, seminars, and education camps for members, including one major annual conference on Islamophobia. The SUM has been engaged in common projects with other organizations for combating racism in Sweden. The head of the organization, Rashid Musa, has participated in many TV and radio programs in order to fight anti-Muslimism.

- Nyans Muslim. This is an Internet platform for discussing and presenting facts concerning racism, in general, and Islamophobia in particular. The site was formed in 2014 and is highly engaged in the production of digitally accessible reports on Islamophobia in Sweden.88

- Ibn Rushd Educational Association. The association’s main goal is to educate people on religion, diversity, and human rights. It is one of ten associations that provide education, seminars, and cultural activities.89

- Muslim Human Rights Committee (MMRK). This is an organization established in 2007 that actively fights anti-Muslimism in Sweden. The leader, Kitimbwa Sabuni, and one of the most active members of the organization, Fatima Doubakil, frequently participate in debates and civil society actions against anti-Muslimism.

- Expo. This is an antiracist civil society organization that fights against racism by producing critical reports and organizing seminars that fight both racism and anti-Muslim racism.

- Khalifatet podcast. This is a podcast in which important issues concerning racism and anti-Muslim racism are discussed and debated.90

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Although the Swedish governmental inquiry *Power, Integration and Structural Discrimination*91 warned the government and other political parties of the problem of racism and the discrimination of marginalized groups with immigrant background and Muslims, in particular, the Swedish government decided to ignore the thirteen reports of the inquiry, its thirty suggestions for changes, and continued its neoliberalization and discriminatory policies.92 As a result of the mainstream parties’ racist policies, according to which migrants in general and Muslims in particular are considered “backwards”, “traditional” and non-compatible with the “modern society of Sweden”, the racist and anti-Muslim party Swedish Democrats (SD) gained considerable electoral support and entered the Swedish parliament in the election of 2010. Ever since, the electoral support for the party has been growing and today the party is the third-largest party in Sweden. The party has an anti-immigrant and anti-Muslim background. The party was founded by racist activists who in the 1980s gathered in a racist network called “Keep Sweden Swedish.” The party leadership and other party members have strong anti-Muslim attitudes, beliefs, and programs, and communicate such beliefs publicly. The party’s electoral success and the mainstream parties’ adjustment of their policies and programs to the SD has had devastating consequences for people with immigrant backgrounds and, in particular, Muslims.

Given the fact that structural and institutional racism and discrimination against Muslims have a political history, counteracting and fighting racism and specifically anti-Muslim racism also requires political decisions and interventions. This can be done in many ways, but first and foremost, political parties need to put an end to thinking in terms of the “voting market,” which makes them adjust themselves to the growing racism and anti-Muslimism sentiments and attitudes. The followings are some suggestions and recommendations in order to combat anti-Muslimism:

1. Anti-discrimination laws must be sharpened, and a new clause in the law concerning anti-Muslim racism should be included in the law.
2. Mainstream parties must stop demonizing and stigmatizing Muslims, and stop cooperation with the racist and anti-Muslim party Swedish Democrats.
3. Given the fact that Muslims make up the majority of marginalized people in Sweden, short-term and long-term anti-marginalization policies should be introduced and implemented by the government. Such policies should not be election-sensitive and must be made part of the country’s long-term social policies.
4. Muslim women’s right to wear a headscarf should be respected as part of their human rights and freedom of religion.
5. Journalists should be held accountable for demonizing Muslims.
6. Schoolbooks and curricula should be reformed, and their anti-Muslim contents should be eliminated.
7. Higher education, in general, and education of journalism and social workers, in particular, should be changed and knowledge of the marginalization and anti-Muslim racism should be included in the higher education curricula.
8. Muslim civil society organizations working against anti-Muslim racism should create a national network and cooperate with other anti-racist organizations.
9. Muslim civil society organizations must actively participate in public debates in order to counter the public demonization of Muslims.
10. Muslim civil society organizations must be more active in using the Internet as their main means of communication.

Executive Summary
Continuous bias and selective framing of Islam, the Muslim community, and events at the national and international levels among prominent commentators, journalists, politicians, and ordinary citizens has unfortunately been very palpable in 2020. It led to a high level of discrimination and the perception of Muslims as a threat. Muslim individuals, mosques, and Islamic organisations were recklessly labelled as a “threat to national security.” The announcement of a mosque project in Reinach triggered a chain of media reactions following unfounded information by Saïda Keller-Messahli. She claimed that the money (“millions”) for the construction of large Albanian mosques (including those in Wil SG, Netstal GL, and Plan-les-Ouates GE) came from Kuwait. This was followed by the controversy over the German edition of the book Qatar Papers with a foreword by Keller-Messahli requesting stricter restrictions and control over Muslims and their respective religious institutions.

Despite the condemnation by the Federal Court of Jean-Luc Addor (SVP national councillor) for his openly racist statements, he carried on his hostile offensive against the headscarf, in particular, and Muslims, in general. He objected to the wearing of the headscarf in public companies, i.e., the Swiss Post and the Swiss Federal Railways, through disseminating protests letters to heads of companies and demanding a popular vote for its legislation in the parliament. Hence, a year of compelled physical distancing led to greater social distancing, meaning a deeper divide between the Muslim community and society at large. Sadly, Muslim women in headscarves became further vulnerable and victimized targets of assaults, abuse, and additional obstacles in apprenticeship and job applications.
Zusammenfassung

So führte ein Jahr der erzwungenen physischen Distanzierung zu einer grösseren sozialen Distanzierung, was eine tiefere Kluft zwischen der muslimischen Gemeinschaft und der Gesellschaft im Allgemeinen bedeutet. Dies führte zu einer zunehmenden Feindseligkeit gegenüber Muslimen. Traurigerweise wurden die muslimischen Frauen mit Kopftuch zu weiteren verletzlichen und victimisierten Zielscheiben von Übergriffen, Beschimpfungen und zusätzlichen Hindernissen bei Ausbildungs- und Stellenbewerbungen.
Résumé

Malgré la condamnation par le Tribunal fédéral de Jean-Luc Addor (conseiller national de l’UDC) pour ses déclarations ouvertement racistes, cet homme politique a poursuivi son offensive hostile contre le foulard en particulier et les musulmans en général. Il s’est opposé au port du foulard dans les entreprises publiques, c’est-à-dire à la Poste et aux Chemins de fer fédéraux suisses, en diffusant des lettres de protestation aux chefs d’entreprise et en exigeant le vote populaire de sa législation au Parlement.

Ainsi, après une année de distanciation sociale forcée (due au COVID), l’éloignement sociale s’est accru, ce qui a creusé le fossé entre la communauté musulmane et la société dans son ensemble. Il en a résulté une hostilité accrue à l’égard des musulmans. Les femmes musulmanes portant le foulard sont malheureusement devenues des cibles de plus en plus vulnérables et victimes d’agressions, d’abus, d’obstacles supplémentaires dans l’apprentissage et les demandes d’emploi.

Introduction

It is noticeable in recent years that most of the organisations fighting against racism faced a reduction in financing. In the editorial of the annual report for 2019 of the Federal Commission against Racism (FCR), Martine Brunschwig Graf, the FCR president, stated how the Secretariat of the Commission necessarily had to operate with fewer employees. In the foreword of the Counselling Network for Victims of Racism annual report on “Racism Incidents from Counselling Practice 2019”, authorities were urged for greater financing of the counselling centres. As a matter of fact, in Paragraph 7, the sixth “ECRI Report on Switzerland” offered the following as a major recommendation: “Counselling Centres for Victims of Racism are strengthened by increased funding (from a budget separate from the Cantonal Integration Programmes) and human resources”.

Even the Contact and Legal Advice Centre of the Federation of Islamic Organisations in Switzerland (FIOS), which has been registering hate crimes against Muslims since January 2018, struggled due to lack of funds. It usually relies on donations from FIOS members to sustain all its functions.

For example, the Canton of Graubünden doesn’t have its own counselling centre for reporting racist incidents. Some even claimed that “the canton does not want to create an official body” because “the case reporting could rise sharply”. The executive director of the FCR confirmed extant efforts and initiatives of the Counselling Network for Victims of Racism to establish such a body, yet affirmed that “it is a ‘political decision’”.

reported to have been the subjects of discrimination\textsuperscript{8} in the preceding year due to religious orientation. (Figure 1) In the 2019 survey, 35\% of Muslim individuals were in at least one specific situation victims of discrimination in Switzerland on the basis of their religious affiliation.\textsuperscript{9}

In the 2019 annual report, the FCR reiterated that the media’s railroading of “negatively charged” issues such as “radicalisation, wearing the burqa,” etc., caused the segregation and distancing of citizens from the Muslim community.\textsuperscript{11}

The report on Switzerland by the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (hereinafter ECRI) corroborated that the “sudden rise” of intolerant discourse against Muslims, “particularly in the media,” is likely leading to “legislation or legislative proposals concerning Muslims in particular”. Moreover, it acknowledged that Muslim women with apparent symbols of religious denomination are “especially susceptible to hate speech due to the intersection of gender and religion which leads to isolation and hinders constructive efforts for an inclusive society”.

As indicated in the report “Racism Incidents from Counselling Practice” for the year 2019, the Counselling Network for Victims of Racism recorded a hyping 352 reported cases of racial discrimination. It identified that the third most common motive for discrimination is the “Muslim hostility” category with 55 counselling cases. Additionally, there were 28 counselling cases in the relatable category of “hostility against people from the Arab world”. The two motives were most frequent in neighbourhoods/quarters (17), public spaces (16), and the labour market (11). Likewise, the platform rassismus.ch, which is run by the GRA Foundation against Racism and Anti-Semitism and the Society for Minorities in Switzerland (GMS), is another important source of reported anti-Muslim attacks. Their last report indicated that threats to “dark-skinned people” and Muslims were recurrent out of the 41 attacks registered in 2019.

The Canton of St. Gallen noted the doubling of reports of racism and discrimination, and illustrated such reports with a case of a bus driver bypassing people of colour or hijabi women.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

It is a fact that there is no generally accepted term of hatred towards Islam or Muslims in Switzerland and that this topic does not attract enough media attention. However, the existing attempts of designating those who use the terms “Islamophobia” or “anti-Muslim racism” as “Islamists” are alarming. The media gives space to those who seek to relativise or question Islamophobia regularly. Thus, Prof. Dr. Koopman had the opportunity to communicate his “empirical findings” that Muslims must look for answers of their Islamophobia arguments in the core or foundational Islamic teachings. Moreover, Koopman's book was promoted in the media and recommended in Neue Zürcher Zeitung (NZZ) a Swiss, German-language daily newspaper as an “important reading”. The book enjoyed publicity in the NZZ with pompous titles such as “Those Who Dismiss Criticism of Islam as Islamophobia Favour the Hands of the Fundamentalists”.

In addition to the above, the anti-Muslim polemicist Sāïda Keller-Messahli claimed that the term 'Islamophobia' is “spread deliberately by Islamists” to prevent “criticism of political Islam”. It is also asserted that the term ‘anti-Muslim racism’ “has been annexed and instrumentalised by Islamists” who “try to garner influence in the guise of anti-racism and equally delegitimise criticism of Islam and Islamist structures”.

Physical and Verbal Attacks

It is unfortunate that an increasing number of Muslims continued to be victimised via hate speech and acts amidst the 2020 global pandemic and its drastic impact on Swiss society which led to lockdowns, restrictive measures on gatherings, and physical distancing. Such a state of affairs should have reflected greater social unity and solidarity instead of deepening segregation. However, the actual number of such hate assaults is obscure. Some victims had no clue where to report while others faced police disregard or lack of understanding of the seriousness of the perpetrated crimes. Hence, it is difficult even to estimate the number of such assaults or attacks. Nevertheless, few cases did receive media attention. The inadequate or sometimes reluctant police action in such cases is a real problem and of particular concern.

For instance, a 50-year-old disabled woman with a headscarf was molested while disposing trash outside a mall on 28 March 2020. An adult man hit her fiercely on the right shoulder and continued cursing and punching her. After attempts to call the police, the attacker ripped her headscarf off. He even vowed to kill her by saying, “Do you think I will allow such a creature to live? I will kill you and your species with these fingers. You dirty Muslims have brought filth and viruses to our land [and] polluted it. Wherever you are, deception follows. Murtering you would be my happiest moment.” The attacker left after noticing two people watching it all unfold. The woman followed him to the mall. Meanwhile, the police went to the woman’s home instead of the mall due to miscommunication. During subsequent communication with the police via phone, she was asked to provide further detail about the attackers (i.e., his name, address, etc.). Upon failure to provide the details, the police instructed her to come to the police station instead of investigating the attackers further. The police officers at the station told her that nothing can be done. The police disregarded her appeals to inspect the camera footage in the areas surrounding the mall on the grounds that no cameras exist around the recycling containers. In the end, the embassy of her home country intervened to defend her.24

Another incident on 5 May 2020, indicates how a stranger at the train station insulted a woman wearing a headscarf on her way to work. Fortunately, a passer-by intervened against the stranger’s aggression. The perpetrator’s insults included “Huere Saupack25, go back where you came from, this is a Christian country!”, “Islamist bitch!”, and “Dirty religion!”. An officer at the police station advised the woman not to file a complaint because “she had no witnesses” and as such “there were no assaults, threats, or aggression”. Hence, the officer advised her to record everything if it happens again in the future and seek the help of witnessing individuals to support her and to identify the man.26

In October and November of 2020, a cantonal Islamic federation and several mosques of the canton received anonymous threatening letters containing insults similar to the aforementioned case but with greater intensity and a harsher tone. (Figure 2) Based on a police officer’s transcription of the handwritten letters, the writer expressed that “all organisations begging for donations to support Muslims in our country” should be closed. In following sections, it read: “Our country should be freed from these pigs! All out of our country, these pig *ckers and murderers. Look at Paris!!!”27 These excerpts suffice to reveal the brutality of the written messages.

On 29 November 2020, flyers with offensive content were found at the entrance of an Albanian mosque. (Figure 3) A case was filed and the investigation is ongoing.

A teenager was found commenting the following on an online video of the Christchurch attack on the two mosques that killed 51 people: “Someday I want to do the same thing in Switzerland”. He was arrested and subsequently detained for ordering several kilograms of chemical products, which could be used to build bombs, from an online drugstore.

Furthermore, an investigation report commissioned by Dübendorf City Council stated that in a conversation between municipal officials, a Muslim woman in a burqa, who had visited the social welfare office in Dübendorf, was called a “penguin”.

Employment

The last report on “Racism Incidents from Counselling Practice” confirmed that the labour market is one of the three most common spaces of expressed hate against Muslims. Even the Swiss Centre for Islam and Society (SZIG) prioritised and addressed this in greater detail through a series of workshops on religion in the workplace. The summary of the outcomes of the workshops is available in the SZIG-Papers 9 entitled “Visible Islam in the Workplace? A Topic for Employees and Employers”.

Recent debates whether headscarves in places like public company counters should be permissible have become a reason for concern. As soon as the discourse gains popularity in the media, a piece of clothing, the headscarf, will lead to floods of immediate negative reactions. A case of employees at public company counters like the Swiss Post illustrates this. The outrage regarding postal employees wearing a headscarf maintains momentum and caused letters by several readers. One can read the following in one such letter in the Zuger Zeitung: “No women displaying their religion as a weapon against their ‘infidel’ fellow men should work in areas of direct customer service.”36; “behind headscarves hide well-developed provocations, instigated by the various well-known Islamic centres in German- and French-speaking Switzerland”37, and “the headscarf is not liberal, but ‘a (politically deployed) symbol of the oppression of women’”.38 Jean-Luc Addor, SVP national councillor, even wrote protest letters to the heads of the Swiss Railways (SBB) and the Swiss Post. He asked the head of SBB, Monika Ribar, for an explanation and wondered how she, as a woman, accepted the wearing of the hijab in the company. He urged it to be banned simply because of the subjective perception that it is “above all a political sign, a symbol of inequality and oppression of women as well as an ostentatious mark of communitarianism”.39

According to Addor, “Customers do not accept that a public company should lend a hand to the advancement of militant Islam in this way”.40

After three years of dedicated efforts, the FIDS Legal Advice and Contact Centre registered numerous cases of the unemployability of hijabi women, among whom one finds highly educated candidates, in their respective professions for years despite regular job applications. Most are often afraid to inquire further in cases of rejection.41 Interestingly, the headscarf became a majorly cited reason for rejection. For instance, a woman was rejected for a social work/counselling position due to views of the hijab as repellent to customers in need of help and counsel.42 (Figure 4)

40. Ibid.
42. “In the outreach context, your faith and the wearing of the headscarf could be very helpful in the cultural context of, for example, Albanian families. Then the corresponding language skills would be necessary. With average, ‘normal’ families, this still triggers too much resistance. For the time being, unfortunately, I do not see any possibility at our specialised agency. I assume that the stationary framework promises more success, because after getting to know each other, the resistance in this regard dissolves”. Case report and a copy of the email sent by the victim by email to the FIDS Legal Advice and Contact Centre.
Meanwhile, hijabi women who find a job frequently face challenges because of the constant questioning of their appearance instead of their qualifications to perform the job. Questions like “What is that on your head?” or “Why is it on your head?” are usual. Most of these women feel humiliated, while some of them feel pressured to compromise and opt for what is perceived as attractive hijab styling.\footnote{Daniel Ganzfried, “SO SEHE ICH DAS”, Schweizer Familie, 2 July 2020, p. 9.}

In her dissertation on educational paths of young Muslims in Switzerland, Nathalie Gasser cites the headscarf as a strong educational barrier in vocational training. She stated that none of the study’s interviewees “wearing a headscarf and willing to do an apprenticeship” enrolled in respective educational programmes directly or on merit-based considerations alone. The reasons are the “many socially circulating stereotypes”, but, above all, the lack of state regulation in awarding apprenticeship contracts.\footnote{“Frau Ibrahimi, was sagt der Islam dazu?”, Pädagogische Hochschule PHBern News, 26 August 2020, https://www.phbern.ch/ueber-die-phbern/aktuell/news/frau-ibrahimi-was-sagt-der-islam-dazu, (Access date: 9 January 2021). Gasser Nathalie, Islam, Gender, Intersektionalität. Bildungswegen junger Frauen in der Schweiz, (Bielefeld: transcript Verlag, 2020).}

She articulated teachers’ attitudes particularly toward female students who are treated as “experts on Islam”. Her work reveals how the young women suffer by being constantly “interrogated as Muslims” and with an increasing expectation on them to give an opinion “on the topics attributed to Islam, global political conflicts, and terrorist events”.\footnote{Ibid.}

The study elaborated how a 22-year-old Muslim woman decided to apply for an apprenticeship in the dental practice after three years of trials for an apprenticeship in medicine despite exemplary school grades. On 25 November 2020, a dentist at the respective apprenticeship responded to her that perhaps “someone with a headscarf, which reflects someone’s beliefs obviously” does not really fit the position.
Few replies followed afterward and in one of them, the dentist said, “When I go to a Muslim country, I adapt to the conditions there, show respect for the culture of the country. I expect this from you as well”. Hence, a personal interview would be considered only if the young woman were willing to adapt; in other words, to renounce her headscarf.47 Once this story became the subject of public deliberation, she was offered legal support and numerous job offers followed.48

It is worth mentioning that even the Federal Supreme Court has upheld an appeal by a 28-year-old Iraqi denied admission to study pharmacy at the University of Basel. At first glance, it appeared that the candidate was simply refused admission. However, the incident became viral after it became known that certain media outlets had described the man as a jihadist threat. Among other matters of concern, the Federal Court claimed that the man had no criminal record and therefore, there was no evidence backing the serious accusations that he was a jihadist terrorist. The accused also denied connections to any jihadist or terrorist organisations repeatedly. It was, thus, decided that the University of Basel must re-evaluate the case and compensate the accused with CHF 2,000.49

In addition to his positions in the media, Jean-Luc Addor, SVP national councillor, interpellated the Federal Council to enforce a legal ban on veils at Swiss Post and Swiss Federal Railways counters “so that customers who rely on the services of these companies are not shocked or feel discomfort”. According to Addor, headscarves and other Islamic symbols should not be tolerated in public companies as they contradict local traditions and the constitutional principle of equality between men and women.50 Dissatisfied with the information provided by the Federal Council, he requested that a law be drafted on the same matter, namely the “Prohibition of headscarves at the counters of the federal administration and companies controlled by the federal government”. The Federal Council proposed to the Parliament to reject the motion.51

The National Council decided not to follow another 2019 parliamentary initiative by Addor labelled “Pupils without head coverings in public schools”.52 Another tentative was then undertaken by CVP National Councillor Marianne Binder who sees in veils a discrimination of girls and wants to ban headscarves for schoolgirls at schools and kindergartens. She submitted a postulate and instructed the Federal Council to submit a report on the basis of which a free development of all children without headscarves can be guaranteed.53

It is important to mention some moves by Reimann Lukas, another controversial SVP national councillor, best known for some earlier requests related to “fighting radical Islam in Switzerland” in 2015 that were based on questionable and misleading statistics which he claimed to have obtained from authorities.54 In 2020, he searched for new statistics about “Islamists in Switzerland” through a new interpellation with 18 questions in order to address his earlier requests based on inaccurate statistics.55

The Federal Council made a counterproposal against the popular initiative “Yes to the ban on face coverings” (known as the Burka Initiative). In March 2020, the Federal Council supported this proposal which includes measures to promote equality between women and men. In the summer of 2020, the National Council supported the Federal Council against the popular initiative. Swiss citizens will have the final say at the ballot box in spring of 2021.56

In 2020, the Swiss Parliament adopted the controversial “Federal Law on Police Measures to Combat Terrorism (PMT)”. The police will get greater discretionary authority and additional instruments to deal with so-called terrorist threats. For example, an obligation to report, a refraining order (Rayonverbots) or the confinement to one’s own home (“house arrest”) as the last resort are envisaged without the existence of specific criminal evidence. The federal government will be able to order these measures on a case-by-case basis at the request of the cantons even against minors aged 12 onwards.57 The law has been sharply criticised by organisations and experts within Switzerland and abroad. Several newly formed parties have even launched a referendum against the new police law to combat terrorism.

The new president of the SVP Aargau, national councillor Andreas Glarner, described as an “Islam hater”, “far-right arsonist”, a person who “attracts media attention with a radical style” and “seeks his clientele in a heated climate”, in his party speech announced that he will address “fie” topics - Islam and Muslims. In his statements, he clearly presented Islam as one of his core issues (in addition to foreigner ratio, migration, and problems in schools) and announced “the preference for Islam” as a problem, to be defended against.

Another report by the reporter Kurt Pelda provoked numerous reactions. Pelda reported about the Muslim preacher Abu Ramadan (Ben Salem Salah), who is the subject of two criminal cases: one on suspicion of welfare fraud and another on suspicion of racial offense. Based on footage taken in a mosque, Abu Ramadan, who officially does not hold any position, allegedly incited the struggle against “infidels” and gave lessons about it in religious studies at the Ar’Rahman Mosque in Biel. In addition to the failed call to close Ar’Rahman Mosque, the following controversial tweet by CVP National Councillor Elisabeth Schneider-Schneiter ended with a criminal complaint: “We have enough legal basis to deport such well poisoners. Let’s do it!”

Finally, Silvan Fischbacher (SP), the councillor of the Dietikon City Council, and 11 co-signatories submitted an interpellation on 5 November 2020 to discover why Dietikon does not have a burial ground for Muslims and to what extent the

The significant role of the Swiss media in inciting and spreading prejudice and intolerance against Muslims remains insufficiently addressed in Switzerland. International sources point to this fact repeatedly. According to the ECRI report, “There has been a sharp rise in intolerant discourse against Muslims generally and in the media particularly”.69

In January, Blick focused on a children’s winter camp described as an “Islamist camp” in which “Turkey indoctrinates Swiss children” and which is organised by the Turkish Islamic Foundation for Switzerland (TISS).70 (Figure 5)71 Numerous comments on the article, most of which fall under hate speech, indicate the grievous danger of such articles.

All media publications demand great responsibility and accountability, and should be supported by thorough fact checking before disseminating biased information. Unfortunately, several media outlets in Switzerland fail to uphold and diverge from such responsible, accountable, and conscientious reporting. This is apparent in the trend of addressing genuine acts of discrimination, segregation, violence, or terror whereby the common causal denominator is levelled deliberately to faith. This is especially so after the recent horrific attacks in Europe when newspaper columns were crammed with shallow analyses by bigoted and dangerous “experts”. Thus, a spokesman for the diocese of Chur from the Giuseppe Gracia media, commenced his sweeping column entitled “Islam and Violence” in Blick with the following: “Paris, Nice, Vienna: In recent weeks, Muslims have again slashed, beheaded and shot innocent women and men”. He is also saying that it has become “delicate” to publicise that murder is “done for Mohammed and Allah”.73 Ulrich von Schwerin is one of the rare journalists who warns against such acts of generalisation toward Muslims or Islam, and approaches this complex issue in a different and more thoughtful and systematic manner by deriving information from genuine sources of knowledge. He argues that “any rhetoric deepening the exclusion and polarisation” benefits extremists and fails to tackle the cases of radicalisation from its social and psychological perspectives in addition to theological/religious, dogmatic, or ideological points of view. Each carries distinct meanings, yet all are mutually relatable. Furthermore, he mentions that the perpetrators were not necessarily genuinely religious before they were radicalised. It is precisely such thoughts and arguments that are deliberately left aside in the mainstream discourse.74

In a statement on the construction of the new Albanian mosque in Reinach AG, Säïda Keller-Messahli questioned it in terms of legitimacy through what later turned out to be questionable correlations. She claimed that the money (“millions”) for the construction of large Albanian mosques (including those in Wil SG, Netstal GL, and Plan-les-Ouates GE) came from Kuwait.75 The Albanian-Islamic Community Reinach rejected her claims that were based on “apparent false information”.76 The Islamic scientist Andreas Tünger-Zanetti, who has dedicated years of research on building projects for immigrant religious communities in Switzerland, strongly criticised Säïda Keller-Messahli. According to Tünger-Zanetti, all “Säïda Keller-Messahli owes the public so far is reliable evidence for claims on all addressed cases”. He pointed out that her “conjectures in the media” “too often” stand without journalistic fact-checking, which “creates an impression of general suspicion” and as such has the immense potential to backfire.\(^77\) Her allegations caused discussions over the building of the mosque in Reinach to fall under serious scrutiny at the National Council where Andreas Gafner, EDU national councillor, interpellated, “Does the intelligence service of the Confederation and other authorities have information that confirms financing of the Tulipan mosque in Reinach from abroad?”\(^78\)

An article by Kari Kälin about the publication of the German edition of the book Qatar Papers by Christian Chesnot and Georges Malbrunot and a foreword by Saïda Keller-Messahli provoked a series of reactions among politicians. The article referred to the book when saying that the non-governmental organisation Qatar Charity (QC) “financed mosques, Islamic associations and projects in Switzerland” with nearly 3.7 million euros. Keller-Messahli warned that the “Qatar Charity actively promotes the formation of parallel societies in Europe” and therewith vigorously attempts to seed confusion “about imams as representatives of political Islam radicalising the youth in mosques”.\(^79\) According to the book, Qatari money mostly finances associations linked to the Muslim Brotherhood whom Keller-Messahli addresses as “not only the largest and most influential Islamist movement in the world today, but also the matrix of all Islamist terrorist organisations”.\(^80\) In September 2019, SVP National Councillor Walter Wobmann used this claim at the National Council to inquire about the “dangerous development”, that “according to media reports, Swiss mosques and the museum in La Chaux-de-Fonds are financed by millions of francs by Qatar (Qatar Charity)” which is “ideologically and directly linked with the extreme Muslim Brotherhood as well”.\(^81\) A week later, CVP National Councillor Marianne Binder-Keller demanded at the National Council an expert opinion via interpellation on the activities of the Muslim Brotherhood in Switzerland. She intended to discover whether the Federal Council is aware of such activities and whether it considers the Muslim Brotherhood extreme.\(^82\)

Moreover, after a knife attack on a 28-year-old mentally ill female convert to Islam in a department store in Lugano, which according to a crime prevention expert was “hastily called an act of terrorism”, Saïda Keller-Messahli called for a ban on radical Islamist organisations in Switzerland in an interview for “20 Minuten”. According to Keller-Messahli, the Muslim Brotherhood has an offshoot in Switzerland for over six decades which regularly communicates and cooperates with respective authorities, whether in the area of refugee aid, pastoral care, or so-called deradicalisation. The Federal Office of Police (Fedpol) of Switzerland stated on Twitter that the woman tried to go to Syria in 2017 because she was in love with a jihadist fighter, but was intercepted, placed under psychiatric custody, and ever since had no relations to any terrorism matters. Three days after the attack, Blick wrote that the woman doesn’t wear a headscarf and has no apparent contact with “Salafists”, but that her only link with Islam is her mourning over her “disappeared” husband.

In the first months of 2020, one could observe how pictures of recognisable Muslim women in headscarves, which had absolutely no relationship with the topic, were increasingly pushed into COVID-19 news headlines. (Figures 6, 7, and 8)

Justice System

The Federal Intelligence Service (NDB) provides the FCR with the cantonal court rulings and decisions regarding Art. 261bis Criminal Code (racism penal norm) in anonymised form. In 2019, four verdicts were placed regarding cases of victimised Muslims.90

The Federal Supreme Court has endorsed the conviction of SVP National Councillor Jean-Luc Addor after the Valais Cantonal Court found him guilty of racial discrimination. The criminal complaint was triggered with his tweet “On en redemande!” (“Let’s have more!”), minutes after a man was shot in a mosque in the eastern city of St. Gallen in 2014. The Federal Supreme Court characterised the rejoicing over the suffering of members of a particular religion as “an expression of aversion”, “an essential characteristic of hatred”, and as discrimination and incitement to hatred.91

cantonal court emphasised in its ruling that Addor was not only a public figure, but also “an Islamophobia instigator”. Moreover, in his postings he had used a form of expression whose “brutality and conciseness could be understood literally and undifferentiated by a less experienced average reader”.92

On an afternoon in October 2018, in Wetzikon, a pedestrian in a headscarf was hit and seriously injured while crossing a pedestrian area divided by a central island. The court acquitted the perpetrator. The Hinwil District Court even validated the driver’s arguments of inability to see her because of her headscarf and black clothing or that the woman’s headscarf blocked her from seeing the vehicle.93

On another occasion, a Muslim inmate at Thorberg Prison was asked to take a urine drug test, which was not possible due to an inability to urinate during fasting in the month of Ramadan. The inmate was not known as a drug user and offered a blood sample. The prison refused and punished the Muslim with eight days in an isolation cell. The Supreme Court upheld an appeal by the inmate and overturned the disciplinary measure on grounds that it was a “disproportionate encroachment on the constitutionally protected freedom of religious practice”.94

Another case raising suspicions against an imam inciting violence against women in a mosque could not be proven. He was suspected of instigating violence against women in an August sermon of 2019 in the Dar-Assalam Mosque in Kriens and was arrested on 9 October.95 According to the Lucerne public prosecutor’s office, the arrest proved to be “unjustified in retrospect” and the imam received a compensation of CHF 200 for nine hours of detention.96

Moreover, the former SVP national councillor Yvan Perrin was acquitted by the police court in Neuchâtel of racial discrimination charges for spreading an ideology of denigration against Muslims. Perrin used his Facebook account to start a controversy about the Museum of Islamic Civilisations in La Chaux-de-Fonds, Neuchâtel, and Muslims in general. His posts were related to an article in the newspaper 24 heures about the Qatar Papers and the Muslim Brotherhood. Currently, the Neuchâtel prosecutor’s office is appealing against Perrin’s acquittal.

The Law on the Recognition of Public Utility of Religious Communities (LRCR), passed by the Grand Council of Neuchâtel on 2 September, offers the possibility of recognising other religious communities in addition to the three historically recognised churches. The SVP and the FDP rejected the law and have independently proposed a referendum take place to determine the issue. Niels Rosselet-Christ, the SVP parliamentary group leader, said the requirements that the municipalities must fulfil were incomplete and that he aimed to avoid “excesses in the mosques”.

Furthermore, in another case the district court sentenced a retiree to a fine for racial discrimination because of besmirching his neighbour’s reputation by sending flyers with racist contents and threats. The flyers contained sentences such as “The whole Islamic world must be destroyed” or “Down with the whole Arab filthy world”. In addition, the accused allegedly wrote the name and address of his neighbour on the flyer to denounce him.

Internet

Numerous comments under newspaper articles, blogs, profiles on social networks, and posts on the subject of Islam and Muslims reveal the extent to which hate speech on the internet is directed against Islam and Muslims. The most and least controversial columns with comments on social media profiles of prominent figures stand out too. The fact that there is no adequate solution and that it is difficult to combat such voluminous hatred against Muslims is evident through the example of the intercultural association JASS (Just a simple Scarf), whose Facebook page “became the recipient of group-specific hatred on the platform” and had to be deactivated due to the vast number of anti-Muslim comments.104 Most comments, according to Andrea Buhler from JASS, related to the headscarf. According to her assessment, these are mostly attacks from the left spectrum: “Among them were some old-school and early feminists, who want to stir up hatred against Muslim women and Muslims”.105

IKEA’s response to a racist comment by a customer led to a barrage of insults between pro and anti-Islam advocated on the client’s Facebook profile.106 (Figure 9)

The Facebook profile of Mireille Vallette’s “Swiss Vigilance Islam Association” (Association Suisse Vigilance Islam ASVI) is known for its orientation toward the right-wing extremist Identitarian movement.108 (Figure 10)

An analysis of the internet forum “Iron March” led to distinct findings about right-wing radicals worldwide, among whom was a Swiss national. Radicalisation on the internet is nothing new for the Swiss authorities because the Swiss far-right scene is on the rise. The National Action Plan (NAP) programme for the prevention and countering of radicalisation and violent extremism does not provide any proactive measures to address the far right because “the focus is on Islamist radicalisation”.109 It seems that the Swiss Parliament “spared left- and right-wing violent extremism” deliberately. Knowing that the Federal Intelligence Service (NDB) is not allowed to follow activities of left- or right-wing extremists in contrast to those of violent Islamists explicitly clarifies the matter.110

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

On her blog “Boulevard of Islamism”, Mireille Vallette wrote about Giorgio Ghiringhelli’s “Stop Islamisation Award” (formerly called “Stop Islam Award”) for which she also sought donations,112 (Figures 11 and 12)

113. Ibid.
The winners of the “Stop Islamisation Award” in 2020 were Uli Windisch (Founder of the Web journal LesObservateurs.ch), Shafique Keshavjee (professor of theology and author of the controversial book Conquering Islam) and Stefano Piazza (columnist at Corriere del Ticino). They were “rewarded for their courageous fight against Islamisation and radicalism” as announced in a statement by Giorgio Ghiringhelli. Hans Stutz, author of the chronology of racist incidents in Switzerland, included this event in his chronology, and wrote, “Giorgio Ghiringhelli announces which people he considers the best Swiss Islamophobes of the past year.” Among the nominees were also Thilo Sarrazin and Hamed Abdel-Samad.

Zukunft.ch hosted an online lecture “Is Islam compatible with our democracy?” on 26 January 2021 with the presence, among others, of Fabienne Alfandari, president of the Association Suisse Vigilance Islam.

Zukunft.ch is also a strong supporter of the Egerkinger Committee’s “Yes to the Veiling Ban” and launched an information campaign on the initiative for the ballot on 7 March, 2021. This was the reason for making information and awareness flyers for the vote on the veiling ban. (Figure 13)

SVP-affiliated magazine Schweizerzeit also actively promotes the initiative with flyers and advertisements.123 (Figures 14, 15)
Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

As part of the “Participation” programme, the government council in Zurich aims to strengthen cooperation with Muslim communities by establishing the Association of Islamic Organisations in Zurich (VIOZ) as a reliable partner and authority on the concerned matters.\(^{126}\)

The head of the Directorate of the Interior and Justice, Evi Allemann, believes that it is no longer justified for the Canton of Bern to limit relations with the four national churches only.\(^{127}\) She strives to examine how to mitigate the unequal treatment of Muslims in terms of training, funding, and pastoral care.\(^{128}\)

Moreover, the Lucerne Cantonal Council President Ylfete Fanaj (SP), known for her inspiring life story, breaks down prejudices through exemplification and wants to give “a voice to those who have none” through political activism.\(^{129}\) She openly advocates the inclusion of minorities in dialogues and sees exponential and potential cooperation through integration with Islam a chance “to clarify misunderstandings and reduce fears.”\(^{130}\)

In addition to the above, the city council decided to provide the Muslim faith community with a burial place for deceased residents of the city of Wil. This is the result of the efforts of a working group consisting of representatives of the city of Wil and the Umbrella Association of Islamic Communities of Eastern Switzerland.\(^{131}\)

The visit of the delegation “Commission for the Dialogue with Islam” to the mosque in Wil (SG) is a reminder of the neglected role of mosques, dialogue with mosques, and the dismantling of prejudices.

The mosque in Wil (SG) was very hospitable toward students, politicians, and all open-minded individuals who wanted to learn first-hand about Islamic life and beliefs as result of the efforts of the mosque’s imam Bekim Alimi and the management board.\(^{132}\)

127. The national churches recognized by public law in Switzerland are: The Protestant (Evangelical-Reformed) church, the Roman Catholic church, Judaism and the Christian Catholic (Old Catholic) church.
Another positive platform of interreligious dialogue and integration of women with different cultural background is the Café-Treff for women, a project of the Interreligious Dialogue Group Dietikon, which promotes the exchange of views and understanding between different religions. The meetings take place alternately in a mosque and a church building.\(^{133}\)

Among the most recent instances of integration and harmonisation in the beginning of the coronavirus pandemic was the successful setting up of a shopping service for Spitex customers by Spitex employees and members of the mosque in Grenchen.\(^{134}\) At a later time, the executive director expressed extensive appreciation to the members of the mosque Ebu Hanife for their empathy and purchases for Spitex clients.\(^{135}\) It is interesting to note that this mosque was unfortunately a target of several racist attacks during the construction phase.\(^{136}\)

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

Hatred and enmity towards Muslims and Islam are damaging the peaceful and neutral image of Switzerland. These sentiments are becoming increasingly rooted in society and doors to professional practices are closing for women who wear a headscarf. The increasing number of hostile interventions by politicians in the parliament, and the increasing prejudice in the media and attacks on the streets against those unable to defend themselves is increasingly worrying to Muslims. This disturbs the religious and social harmony in Switzerland. A nation like Switzerland, known for its global legislative reputation, should not allow unfounded statements and regular fake information in newspapers to become a source of inspiration for legislation. Furthermore, it should ensure safety and peace of mind to all its citizens and residents through instructing, for instance, the police to take affirmative action instead of letting it neglect the voices of the oppressed. As a nation esteemed for the quality of its education globally, it should protect against the employment discrimination of hardworking students and protect them from being marginalised.

Moreover, while the question “Who funds mosques?” has been asked for years, especially by those who do not enter mosques, it would be fair to ask the question “Who is funding the hatred against Muslims in Switzerland?” A more proactive and vigilant state needs to explore and expose Islamophobic networks of unnumbered actors, organisations, and media – namely what Dr. Oliver Wäckerlig conceptualised in his book as the “Islamophobic network” (Vernetzte Islamfeindlichkeit).\textsuperscript{137}

The following is recommended:

- To launch a new study against the bias on Islam and Muslims in the Swiss media and to implement more practically the recommendations that came out of the previous study led by Dr. Ettinger, a researcher of the University of Zürich.\textsuperscript{138}
- To increase the monitoring of hate speech on both social media and in the media in general.
- To prevent further discrimination against women wearing headscarves, the state should regulate the awarding of apprenticeship contracts. This is the concluding recommendation in Dr. Nathalie Gasser’s dissertation on the educational paths of young Muslims in Switzerland.\textsuperscript{139} Similarly, as stated in the paper “Visible Islam in the Workplace? An Issue for Employees and Employers” by the SZIG, awareness of cultural and religious diversity and its practice should be nurtured among employers, both private and public.\textsuperscript{140}
- Existing structures of counselling centres must be further reinforced. Each canton should have an adequate counselling centre to relieve the burden on counselling centres responsible for few cantons and funding should be increased. Although there is a diverse infrastructure of subsidised counselling centres, there is none in the counselling network for victims of racism that solely specializes in anti-Muslim hatred.
- To reinforce the development of regular training on living in diversity and antiracial awareness for school employees and police officers.

Executive Summary

The year 2020 was anything but ‘business as usual’. What started with a fresh government enjoying a strong parliamentary majority and the promise of putting behind the Brexit turmoil of the past four years ended up being crushed by the reality of the COVID-19 pandemic. Unsurprisingly the crushing effect of the pandemic has drowned out public debate on prejudice, social divisions, and hate crime. The forced retreat of everyday life to the intimate private sphere has made detecting and recording Islamophobia even more difficult and contested. The near-total absence of debate in the midst of a deadly pandemic has muffled voices and shaded other concerns out of the picture. Relatively little was heard of Islamophobia in 2020, in spite of the fact that the governing Conservative party continues to be generating the wrong kind of headlines for its ingrained anti-Muslim prejudice.

All this in no way means that Islamophobia in the UK has been in retreat in 2020 - quite the opposite in fact. It is becoming increasingly clear that anti-Muslim hate crime grew in intensity and volume during the pandemic, finding a host of new forms of, and outlets for, public expression. Hate crime figures continued their familiar upward trajectory, bolstered by more than a third after the first lockdown. Racially and religiously aggravated attacks registered loud and clear on the radar. The largest and governing UK mainstream political party (Conservatives) continued to wrestle with structural anti-Muslim prejudice while the major opposition (Labour) party did not escape criticism, since a significant proportion of its Muslim-background members reported that they had experienced or witnessed Islamophobia within the party. Meanwhile cases of discrimination against members of ethnic, religious, and/or racial minorities extended across all spheres of life. What is of further note, however, is how quickly and effortlessly the Islamophobic currents adapted to the new extraordinary situation caused by COVID-19, how they were redirected to new - predictably, mostly online - outlets, and how they morphed into new divisive tropes.

The rising threat of the far/radical right continues to be felt in recorded hate crime incidents, offline and especially online. However, this should not distract from the growing realisation that Islamophobia is a major problem of the British mainstream. It feeds from and into ingrained realities of everyday, institutional and structural racism. It is pervasive, routinised, normalised and detoxified, reproduced and reinforced more subtly under supposedly respectable tropes such as ‘free speech’. It remains encrypted in core public attitudes to identity, sovereignty, and security. It is far from an outlier, the preserve of extremists beyond the fringes of mainstream society. This ongoing and deepening embedding of Islamophobia into otherwise mainstream discourses and practices deserves much closer scrutiny for its cumulative effect on normalising anti-Muslim prejudice and racism in contemporary Britain.

Country: United Kingdom

Type of Regime: Unitary parliamentary constitutional monarchy

Form of Government: Parliamentary democracy headed by a prime minister leading the executive.

Ruling Parties: Conservative Party (since 2010)

Opposition Parties: Labour Party (official opposition); Liberal Democrats; regional parties (Scottish National Party; Plaid Cymru; Democratic Unionist Party; Sinn Féin); Green Party; Brexit Party (since 2019).

Last Elections: 2019 Parliamentary Elections: the Conservative Party won 43.6% of the vote and 365 out of 650 parliamentary seats in the House of Commons, achieving a parliamentary majority of 86; the Labour Party came a distant second with 32.1% and 202 seats, with the Liberal Democrats third (in votes) with 11.5% but only 11 seats; and the Scottish National Party fourth with 3% but with a larger share of 48 seats (all in Scotland). The recently formed Brexit Party, which had emerged as the largest party in the May 2019 elections for the European Parliament, managed only 2% of the vote and did not elect any MPs.

Total Population: 66,182,000 (2011 census)/66,775,286 (2019 estimate)

Major Languages: English (98%), Scots (2.5%), Welsh (1%); Scottish Gaelic, Cornish, and Irish (all <0.1%).

Official Religion: Church of England (Christian Anglican) in England only; no established religion in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Statistics on Islamophobia:

The official Spring 2019 - Spring 2020 reporting cycle for England/Wales does not include data from the period of the pandemic. Nevertheless, it shows an 8% overall increase in the number of reported hate crime cases. The closest equivalent figures regarding religiously motivated hate crime for Scotland showed a rather more significant increase of 24% from 2018-19 - the same percentage that was also recorded in Northern Ireland. The 2018-20 Crime Survey for England and Wales highlights that recorded hate crime incidents are nearly four times higher in the case of individuals and households with Muslim background than the countrywide average figure, and seven times higher in comparison to cases involving those identifying as Christians. Nevertheless, preliminary figures for the first half of 2020 show that the number of racially or religiously aggravated offences ended up growing by 34% in June-July 2020 in comparison to the same period of 2019.
Major Religions (% of Population): Christianity (59.5%), No religion (25.7%), Islam (4.5%), Hinduism (1.3%), Sikhism (0.7%), Judaism (0.4%), Buddhism (0.4%), Other (0.4%) (2011 census).

Muslim Population (% of Population): 2,786,635 (2011 census or 4.8% of total UK population), 3,372,966 (2017-18 Annual Population Survey); 47% are British-born.

Main Muslim Community Organisations: Muslim Council of Britain (MCB), Muslim Association of Britain

Main NGOs Combatting Islamophobia: Muslim Council of Britain, Muslim Engagement and Development (MEND), Tell MAMA UK, Islamophobia Watch, Islamic Human Rights Commission, Islamophobia Response Unit (ISU), Cage, HOPE Not Hate

Far-Right Parties: British National Party (BNP), UK Independence Party (UKIP), National Front, English Democrats, British Democrats

Far-Right Movements: English Defence League (EDL), Britain First (deregistered in 2017), For Britain, Generation Identity, New British Union (NBU), Football Lads Alliance, Veterans Against Terrorism, Blood and Honour, British Movement

Far-Right Militant Organisations: Combat 18, National Action (proscribed in 2016)

Limitations to Islamic Practices

- Hijab Ban: No, but schools have the right to determine their own dress code, which has led to some cases of hijab ban for particular student age groups.
- Halal Slaughter Ban: No
- Minaret Ban: No
- Circumcision Ban: No
- Burka Ban: No
- Prayer Ban: No
Introduction

The year 2020 was anything but ‘business as usual’. For the UK the year started with the promise on turning the page of more than three years of political upheaval caused by Brexit and its aftermath. With a fresh government in place enjoying the strongest parliamentary majority for nearly two decades and the country’s official withdrawal from the EU in January 2020, it was hoped that a more meaningful public debate could have resumed after such a long time of introspection and obsession with all things Brexit. By March, it was becoming painfully clear that there was a new elephant in the room - a deadly pandemic that very soon brought life to an unprecedented state of near-standstill, literally and metaphorically alike.

Yet, racist prejudices of all kinds have always evidenced their resilience and evolutionary adaptability. Embedded in everyday practices, sustained by deep-rooted cultural patterns, and anchored on the structures of present-day society, ‘othering’ actually thrives in situations where the public sphere is silenced and life presents itself as a profound existential crisis.¹ Even in the absence of officially published figures it is clear that Islamophobia in the UK during the COVID-19 pandemic grew in intensity and volume, finding a host of new forms and outlets for public expression. In some respects, it was indeed ‘business as usual’: hate crime figures continued their familiar upward trajectory; racially and religiously aggravated attacks registered loud and clear on the radar; mainstream political parties continued to wrestle with structural anti-Muslim prejudice; and cases of discrimination against members of ethnic, religious, and/or racial minorities extended across all spheres of life. This said, in a year where physical life retreated to the most intimate private spaces and opportunities for in-person social interaction were severely constricted, it is still striking how quickly and effortlessly the Islamophobic currents were redirected to new - predictably, mostly online - outlets and morphed into new divisive tropes.

A survey of Islamophobia incidents and trends requires making a number of qualitative and quantitative distinctions: between on- and offline occurrences; between physical and verbal expressions; between racial, religious, ethnic/cultural, or other motives; between extremist and quotidian manifestations; between radical and mainstream, individual and institutional, cliché and malicious, and so on. These distinctions are undoubtedly valid and help introduce nuance to the discussion of the state of Islamophobia in a country. However, they also run the risk of increasing the analytical resolution so much that one may lose sight of how interconnected and mutually reinforcing all these diverse currents are. In the last two or so years, the UK has at last taken the threat presented by the radical/far right seriously enough, with the country's security services implementing a far-reaching reorganisation in order to respond more effectively to the escalating challenge. This is welcome news of course, as is the ongoing public scrutiny regarding structural Islamophobia and/or anti-Semitism in the two main political parties (Conservative and Labour). Yet the narrative is also strangely comforting for mainstream British society for it displaces the source of Islamophobia to the fringes of the political spectrum, presenting hate crime as equivalent to an extreme ‘exception’ to the rule. If anything, the last two years have demonstrated how even an increasing public focus on, and fight against, Islamophobia does not easily translate into equivalent changes in the broader ideas, beliefs, and behaviours that feed anti-Muslim prejudice or normalise aspects of it. Without confronting the reality of everyday, institutional and structural racism (of which Islamophobia is both one among many manifestations and one of the most prevalent, yet also most normalised form) in contemporary Britain, any welcome focus on Islamophobia as a social and political outlier will do little to address the experience of quotidian discrimination for millions of British citizens with a Muslim background.

Discussion of Islamophobic Incidents and Discursive Events

Physical and Verbal Attacks

The full impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on the number of recorded Islamophobic incidents will not be known until well into 2021, when the UK and devolved governments publish their annual round of official statistics about hate crime for the preceding year. At the time of compiling this report, the most recent published data cover only a small part of 2020 and thus do not capture any changes effected by the spread of the pandemic and the country’s serial lockdowns during the year. For reasons of comparison, the Spring 2019 - Spring 2020 official reporting cycle for England/Wales shows an 8% overall increase in the number of reported hate crime cases. Regrettably this figure excludes data from the UK’s third-largest police body (Greater Manchester Police). Under the ‘religion’ flag, the latest report records a small drop in the number of reported cases (5%) but this figure comes with the important caveat that a number of crimes involve more than one motive and it is practically impossible to separate key categories such as race (as per previous years, by far the largest category with 69%) and religion. Exactly half of the reported religious hate crime involved Muslims (yet another small increase year-on-year). The closest equivalent figures regarding religiously motivated hate crime for Scotland showed a rather more significant increase of 24% from 2018-19 - the same percentage that was also recorded in Northern Ireland under the ‘faith/religion’ flag that excludes sectarian hate crime. Attacks with explicit anti-Muslim motive are also recorded in the hate crime statistics published by the London Metropolitan Police, as well as in response to Freedom of Information (FOI) requests. In most of these sources for 2019 and parts of 2020, the trend is broadly similar - a muted upward trajectory, more or less in line with 2019, without significant deviations.

By comparison, the triennial Crime Survey for England and Wales offers a much broader and less statistically rigorous but more intimate picture of how ‘othering’ is woven into everyday spaces and practices that so often go undetected by big data or official reporting. During the 2018-20 census period, the survey recorded 120,000 personal hate crime incidents and 70,000 further cases involving households. These figures represent a rate of 0.2% across the entire population. but it is almost four times higher in the case of individuals and households with Muslim background (or more than seven times when compared to hate crimes against those identifying as Christians). This figure is significantly higher in comparison to any other targeted group defined according to religion, racism, or ethnicity. In addition, the report highlights a range of intersectionalities between identity and class, with those living in the most deprived areas of the UK twice as likely to be targets of hate crime.

Given the exceptional situation caused by COVID-19, this year’s official published surveys often include an annex that provides further provisional data from 2020 in an attempt to capture the effects of the pandemic and the lockdowns. Although, as previously mentioned, the full dataset for 2020 will not be available until at least the spring of 2021 and thus any insights based on these provisional figures should be treated with caution, it is clear from a series of reports that hate crime during the pandemic was affected by two contradictory realities: on the one hand, the significantly reduced presence and visibility of minority groups in the public space due to the repeated lockdown restrictions, and, on the other, the negative effect of the pandemic in terms of restricting social empathy and stoking fear and hatred vis-à-vis ‘others’. This in essence means that the figures already published for the first half of 2020 come with a significant caveat - they cannot capture how much the pandemic stoked distrust and fuelled prejudice because the lockdown has (temporarily) reduced the opportunities for public hate crimes that such surveys usually record. Still, the emerging picture is stark: during the first half of 2020, racially or religiously aggravated offences recorded by the police increased significantly overall. The curve captures the contradictory forces in effect: the number of hate crime offences fell significantly during March-May (the period of the first lockdown in the UK) but rose sharply immediately afterwards, almost mirroring the effect witnessed in previous years in the aftermath of terrorist attacks in the UK and globally. In fact, provisional figures for June and July 2020 show that racially and religiously aggravated hate crime recorded by the police rose by about a third in comparison to 2020.7

If the (brief) decline in the number of recorded hate incidents against Muslims during the first UK lockdown is easily explainable and hardly surprising, it belies a more complex story. Unsurprisingly, the significant rise in online hate acts against minority communities - and Muslims in particular - during the lockdown reflected the enforced shift in social interaction from the physical to the virtual sphere. At the same time, however, the increased spread of all kinds of conspiracy theories9 and

7. Home Office, Hate Crime in England and Wales, 2019-20, Figure A1; Hate crime, England and Wales, 2019 to 2020; data tables false stories on the internet set the foundations for a veritable post-lockdown spurt in both off- and online hate incidents against Muslims.\textsuperscript{10} In the midst of the first lockdown in the spring of 2020, the far-right hate group Free-Handers posted stickers in a number of cities in northern England blaming immigration and ‘open borders’ for the spread of the virus in Britain.\textsuperscript{11} The result of all these on- and offline campaigns was that Islamophobia emerged both quantitatively and qualitatively strengthened from the first UK lockdown, reaching new outlets and taking on a range of new discursive forms but still reinforcing the same stereotypes and key divisive messages.\textsuperscript{12} In fact, the cumulative effect of local and global far-right activism during the pandemic has strengthened its core narrative against globalisation, multiculturalism, and immigration, making minority groups significantly more vulnerable to hate both on- and offline.\textsuperscript{13}

\caption{Number of racially or religiously aggravated offences by the police (2019-20).\textsuperscript{14}}

These and other changes will no doubt be reflected in statistics that will be published in 2021. At this stage, it is safe to assume that the breakdown of anti-Muslim hate crime captured by the official 2019-20 figures will look significantly different in next year’s report. For the census period ending in March 2020, hate crime recorded under the ‘religion’ flag showed a much higher incidence rate of criminal damage and arson attacks than in any other classification. This included a wide range of incidents ranging from physical attacks to either person or property to verbal abuse to lower-level pervasive intimidation directed at individuals and/or local communities. Every now and then reports highlight the extent of the attritional effect of everyday intimidation and discrimination: for example, in February, it was revealed that four out of ten Muslims living in Scotland have been experiencing Islamophobia on a near-daily basis; and four out of five Scottish Muslim women had suffered from significant, repeated, and widespread abuse in every public space from education and employment to transport and the high street. Muslim communities themselves have warned against the adverse effect of the pandemic and the lockdown on community cohesion: local Muslim leaders in the north of England, for example, warned the authorities that the everyday experience of Islamophobia has become significantly more pervasive since the lockdown, generating local community tension that is often impossible to detect in official statistics. A recently published report commissioned on the effects of the pandemic and the associated (first) lockdown on communities with Muslim background commissioned by the Muslim Council of Britain (MCB) highlighted the perfect storm of significantly higher infection rate and COVID-related mortality among BAME communities; loss of community interaction in the wake of the long suspension of religious, social, and cultural activities during the lockdown; and the negative depiction of Muslims in the UK media.

21. Ibid.
In line with previous years, Muslim places of worship remained extremely vulnerable to performative vandalism and physical attacks - but the parabola of 2020 shows that the overwhelming majority of these incidents occurred either before or after the first lockdown. The year 2020 literally started with the spraying of racial slurs on walls adjacent to the North Brixton Islamic Cultural Centre in London.\(^{22}\) In March, the Hussainia Mosque and Community Centre in Birmingham were also targeted with offensive graffiti. But it was after the relaxation of the restrictions brought the reopening of places of worship that most of the incidents were recorded, confirming fears that the lockdown hiatus was only a temporary respite.\(^{23}\) Arson attacks such as the one against the mosque on Aylsham Road in Norwich (July),\(^{24}\) and acts of vandalism such as the spraying of offensive slogans on the walls of the Farooq E Azam Islamic Centre in Bowsfield Lane and the Jamia Al-Bilal Mosque in Northcote Street in Durham (June) are the shocking visible tip of an iceberg that often overshadows the alarming rise and devastating cumulative effects of quotidian Islamophobic practices in community and public spaces. The escalating physical intimidation tactics of far-right groups such as Britain First have prompted community initiatives to protect mosques and Islamic centres. Initiatives of this kind, such as the one reported in South Yorkshire in January 2020, underline both the growing threat of the far right and the increasing inadequacy of state protection extended to Muslim places of worship.\(^{25}\) It is telling that only 27 mosques received modest government funding for upgrading their security arrangements.\(^{26}\) A further government consultation about improving the protection of places of worship launched in March had not reported its findings or recommendations at the time of writing.\(^{27}\)

Employment

The workplace remains one of the most vulnerable habitats of Islamophobia in the UK, with Muslims receiving on average between 13 and 21% less pay, and having to try much harder than white employees - whether British or from Western Europe and North America - to get hired. For years now research on conditions of work for BAME employees has unearthed a disturbing landscape of ongoing conscious and unconscious bias, as well as multiple barriers to upward mobility, whereby race, religion, ethnicity, and gender very often intersect to reinforce discrimination. However, the profound changes in workplace practices caused by the COVID-19 pandemic during 2020 (especially the shift to working from home) have also underlined the significance of the workplace in terms of strengthening community spirit, deconstructing racial and religious stereotypes, and fostering better understanding between different communities.

Of course, the ongoing health crisis has put the spotlight on the places of work that have become so crucial in the fight against the pandemic. Rigorous empirical research and anecdotal evidence paint a distressing picture of rife Islamophobia in NHS work settings: four in five Muslim employees revealed they had experienced Islamophobia or racism within the NHS, more than two-thirds believed that the situation has been getting significantly worse in recent years, and 43% have considered quitting their job because of the abuse they have experienced. The well-documented higher vulnerability of BAME people from COVID was illustrated in the context of the NHS frontline: the first four doctors to die from COVID were of Muslim background, and, more generally, Muslim NHS staff were twice as likely to die from the disease while working than their white colleagues. Meanwhile prejudice and abuse, already well-documented in the interactions of Muslim medical staff with some patients (for example, reports that the organisation tends to treat BAME doctors as ‘outsiders’), were reproduced even in the crisis-hit medical spaces during the COVID pandemic.

In a year when Raffia Arshad became the first hijab-wearing Muslim woman appointed as judge for the Midlands Circuit having herself been subjected to all forms of discrimination while working in courts, different pieces of research put particular focus on the significant and ongoing difficulties that women with a Muslim background face in their everyday life and workplace. This group remains about three times more likely to be affected by unemployment. With professional environments failing to support the particular needs of both women and BAME employees, with practices that foster exclusion continuing to be rife (for example, the fetishisation of a drinking culture as one of the primary conduits for team-building in the workplace), the professional spaces continue to be hostile to many Muslims - and Muslim women in particular. The need for a safe, discrimination-free, and culturally sensitive workplace in the UK has been further underlined in 2020 by the case of Zeinab Alipourbabaie, a senior electrical engineer at Dyson who won an unfair dismissal case against her employer on grounds of repeated religious and racial discrimination. She had been forced to resign because of harassment, bullying, and discrimination by a senior company manager who made it clear on numerous occasions to her that he ‘disliked Muslims’ and thought they ‘were violent’.

Education

In a country where 93% of all school headteachers are white and nearly half of BAME teachers hesitate to report discrimination or bullying because of a belief that they were unlikely to be supported by the school authorities, it is not surprising that education has for years been a primary area of concern regarding Islamophobia. Education, especially primary and secondary, is crucial in challenging existing prejudices and fostering a deeper understanding of difference among younger Brits.28 In March, a primary school teacher in the south of England was banned from working after repeatedly using racist language on social media - for example calling Islam ‘cancer of the world’ and a ‘vile, vile, vile religion’.29 Racist bullying in schools has continued to rise in recent years, typically spiking in the wake of periods of crisis (terror attacks, COVID crisis, etc.), leading to the exclusion of thousands of Muslim students from education.30 Meanwhile the government’s draconian counter-radicalisation rules meant that the Birchfield Independent Girls School in Birmingham was assessed as ‘inadequate’ because of a controversial ‘inflammatory’ leaflet found in its library that dated back to 1994 and, according to the inspectors, amounted to ‘pupils not being safe from potential radicalisation’.31

But, in 2020, the focus also moved to higher education - a very important space for young Muslims in the UK that had until recently received less attention in the context of Islamophobia research. A large-scale research project investigating perceptions of Islam in British university campuses has revealed a very different picture to the standard perception of universities as spaces of pluralism that welcome and defend diversity.32 With students from Muslim background making about 9% of the UK student population, the emerging picture of widespread suspicion towards Islam that verges on hostility, mistrust of Muslim students, and perceptions of Islam and Muslims as a culturally awkward fit or even a threat to Britain, is a further alarming reminder of how embedded Islamophobia has become in contemporary British society and what a significant disempowering effect it is having on young Muslims. The government’s counter-radicalisation and -terrorism strategy Prevent, in particular, has been singled out as a key driver of negative perceptions vis-à-vis Muslims in university campuses, promoting a stereotypical image of Islam as a security threat linked to terrorism even at a time when Prevent referrals relating to the far right are growing at an alarming pace and have overtaken any other category. The research project confirms what has been feared for some time now, namely that Prevent - in its current format at least - does much more to reinforce systemic Islamophobia than to combat radicalisation.

It should not come as a huge surprise that certain sectors of the UK media and politics have constantly criticised initiatives against discrimination in universities by deploying their favourite weapon - freedom of speech. The Daily Mail produced a piece that accused universities of ‘severe crackdowns on freedom of speech’ and ‘censorship’. The article utilised a report published by the right-wing think tank Civitas that ranked universities according to how restrictive their policies were regarding views deemed offensive, discriminatory, or racist.38 Again the report was picked up by both the tabloid and broadsheet newspapers typically promoting the ‘free speech’ agenda.39 The University of Cambridge was particularly singled out by being placed in the ‘red’ tier (‘performing badly’ in terms of alleged ‘censorship’) in the Civitas report. This is because the university has been in the headlines, partly because of a number of disinvitations regarding controversial academics and speakers, but also because its governing body debated the institution’s freedom of speech policy. A very public debate concerning the merits of ‘respect’ or ‘tolerance’ of different (and controversial) views escalated into something akin to a symbolic battle of a much deeper culture war. The overwhelming support of the university’s governing body for the ‘tolerance’ formula40 is unlikely to settle the broader issue or indeed appease the champions of ‘free speech’ as an overriding and uncompromising entitlement. Unsurprisingly, following the Cambridge vote, an emboldened Toby Young of the Free Speech Union (FSU) has started campaigning to demand that the university re-invite Jordan Peterson on the grounds of this very ‘tolerance’ of different view. Peterson had been disinvented from a university fellowship in 2019 for his extreme and inflammatory views on anything from gender equality and racism to Islamophobia (which he considers a ‘word created by fascists to manipulate’).41

Politics

Compared to the high political drama of the previous years, 2020 was rather underwhelming in political terms, with public discourse overcome and practically silenced by the pandemic. Yet once again, under the grave shadow of the health crisis and the sense of existential threat, a lot went almost under the radar. The relative shortfall of headline-grabbing political stories makes it easier for this year’s UK report to shift the focus on Islamophobia in the political sphere not as an exception driven by the fringes but as a structural, normalised practice of mainstream politics and society.42

It is indeed depressing that each of the two main political parties of the UK are struggling to deal with accusations that they are rife with bigotry on both the national and the local levels. The year 2019 came and went with the Conservative Party accused of endemic Islamophobia and the Labour Party investigated for pervasive anti-Semitism. The year 2020 began with promises of catharsis for both political families. Yet such hopes were proved shallow quickly. The Conservative Party backtracked on its earlier assumed promise to conduct a full-scale investigation specifically on Islamophobia amongst its ranks, opting instead for an abstract enquiry into ‘discrimination (including on the grounds of alleged Islamophobia)’. The switch of focus was criticised as an evasive manoeuvre and a facade, essentially reneging on the very public promise by prime minister Johnson to conduct an enquiry specifically on Islamophobia. What is equally distressing, however, is that the Equalities and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) decided not to hold its own investigation into ‘discrimination and Islamophobia’ in the party because ‘in the light of the decision by the Party to institute an independent investigation, … it would not be proportionate to initiate our own investigation at this stage’. The party’s own enquiry started months after its terms were published and is ongoing. In September 2020, the HOPE Not Hate (HnH) anti-fascism campaign published a devastatingly detailed and effective submission dossier to the enquiry, which covered both a forensic examination of structural Islamophobia in all levels of the Tory party but also exposed the gross inadequacies in the party’s investigative and disciplinary mechanisms. The report reiterated a range of shocking findings: more than half of the party’s members think of Islam in negative or very negative terms; nearly half consider it a ‘threat’ to British society; nearly 80% of members rejected the idea that Islamophobia was a problem within the party; four in ten did not believe that Islamophobia was a problem in Britain; and the extent of anti-Muslim prejudice expressed by the party membership is significantly higher than either the national average or the equivalent figure vis-à-vis other minority/religious groups such as Jews or Hindus.

49. The report “Conservative Party Inquiry on all Forms of Racism including Islamophobia: Hope Not Hate Submission of Evidence” was published on 30.9.2020 by Hope Not Hate and can be accessed at https://www.hopenothate.org.uk/2020/09/30/the-deep-roots-of-islamophobia-in-the-conservative-party/
As calls for an additional independent enquiry into specifically Islamophobia within the Conservative Party gather momentum,\textsuperscript{51} it is clear that the problem continues to be so pervasive and systemic that it cannot simply be wished away. The MCB submitted an updated dossier of evidence of Islamophobia in the Conservative Party to the EHRC in March 2020, which implicated 300 party figures from individual activists and local government figures to members of parliament, members of the cabinet, and government special advisors.\textsuperscript{52} Taken together, the two different dossiers from the MCB and HnH add further up-to-date evidence to the already substantial documentation on Tory on- and offline Islamophobia collated in previous years by these and other campaigns. The party responded by suspending a number of the members exposed by the reports\textsuperscript{53} - typically local councillors and activists like Theodora Dickinson who attacked the Labour MP Naz Shah by asking her to ‘go back to Pakistan’. But what about those like Bob Blackman - a Tory MP with considerable pedigree in anti-Muslim initiatives - accepting an invitation to address an event that also hosted Katie Hopkins (who featured as one of the central figures in the UK Islamophobia network in the 2019 report)? Or, the junior health minister Nadine Dorries - again a known entity for her long-standing propagation of all kinds of anti-Muslim stereotypes involving the niqab or grooming and for sanctioning Islamophobic content from objectionable online sources - uncritically retweeting a doctored video of the Labour Party leader Keir Starmer posted by an account linked to far-right online agitation? Or, Craig Whittaker, another Conservative MP, blaming BAME communities - singling out Muslims as an example - for a COVID spike in the north of England in July?

Furthermore, it is overly simplistic to present the problem of structural racism in the UK mainstream parties as one of Conservative Islamophobia versus Labour anti-Semitism. Each party has been weaponising their opponents’ discrimination woes in order to detract attention from their own failings as inclusive political families. In fact, recently published research found that the two main political parties show very similar (that is, high) levels of discrimination across a wide range of minority groups. According to another research report published by the Labour Muslim Network, 29% of Muslim members have experienced Islamophobia in the party, 37% have witnessed it, 48% do not believe that the party has robust mechanisms to deal with discrimination complaints, and more than half do not trust the leadership to deal with the problem effectively. In March, the party took the decision to suspend Trevor Phillips, a controversial figure whose intellectual journey started with him pioneering research on Islamophobia in the 1990s but has ended up epitomising a mainstream flavour of ‘Islamophobia scepticism’ and has turned into a taboo-breaking free speech fighter.

Predictably the decision has been controversial, with the free speech brigade out in full force working hard to reduce the entire discussion to a putative choice between freedom and tyranny.\textsuperscript{61} Controversial though this decision has been,\textsuperscript{62} it serves as a reminder that Islamophobia has long ceased to be a fringe concern and has become normalised within the public sphere to the extent that it makes distinctions between radical and mainstream politics increasingly problematic in this respect.

Of course, all this focus on Islamophobia in mainstream politics in no ways means that the trademark toxicity of the far-right discourses on Islam and Muslims was tamed by the lockdown. For years the discourse of ‘freedom of speech’ has provided a convenient fig leaf to disguise, justify, and thus normalise divisive political agendas for the radical right - and many more, alas. The year 2020 was a vintage year in this respect and it started with a bang for the British far right when three of its key figures, Stephen Yaxley-Lennon who is mostly known as Tommy Robinson, Carl Benjamin, and Catherine Blaiklock, founded a new political group called ‘Alliance of Free Speech’. Its professed goal was to bring together a broad-based national movement capable of ‘challenging the liberal agenda and educating the public and providing the tools to push back the tide’ on behalf of the fabled ‘silent majority’. At the Alliance’s launch party held in central London in late February, the three founders were joined by Pastor Wale Babatunde, senior minister of the World Harvest Christian Centre in Nigeria, known for his ultra-nationalist and culturally ultra-conservative views, and author of the aptly titled trilogy \textit{Great Britain Has Fallen; Awake! Great Britain and Great Men and Women That Made Great Britain Great: How Christians Can Change Society}. Since its launch, the Alliance has hit at the widest range of targets under the convenient guise of freedom of speech: ‘political correctness’, ‘gender confusion’ and ‘LGBTQ ideology’, ‘cynical political elites’, ‘woke Anglophobia’, ‘fake news’ allegedly promoted by mainstream media, ‘uncontrolled immigration’, and so no. Yet the well-known Islamophobic calibre of the three founders means that the Alliance made no attempt to disguise its anti-Muslim ideology. It called for a ‘conversation on Islam’,\textsuperscript{63} with its spokesperson, Peter Mcilvenna (another ex-UKIP figure) stressing that ‘neither the Islamisation of our culture nor the grooming gang scandal has been enough to wake people up’.\textsuperscript{64}

\begin{enumerate}
\end{enumerate}
\end{flushright}
In this and other similar initiatives in the fringes of the radical right, the anti-Muslim agenda (linked to the ‘grooming gangs’ trope so beloved by the British far right)\textsuperscript{66} sits alongside the familiar rants against immigration, gender, and national identity, all marching together under the banner of freedom and self-defence from a supposed threat. But it was the news that Robinson was allowed to join an otherwise branded as ‘mainstream’ initiative taken in the same name of free speech - Toby Young’s Free Speech Union (FSU) – that drew attention to the alarming slippage between far right and mainstream. As a figure, Young has controversially straddled the radical-mainstream political schism. He has been politically close to the Conservative Party but at the same time has expressed a range of radical and controversial views on sensitive topics (e.g. support for eugenics and for ‘free’ [non-public] schools). Young’s FSU initiative was set up as a ‘non-partisan, mass-membership public interest body that stands up for the speech rights of its members’. For this platform he earned support from significant mainstream constituencies attacking ‘political correctness’ and ‘cancel culture’ who in the past have questioned the need for a legal definition of Islamophobia. Young’s ‘free speech’ church, however, sports a very broad canopy - so broad in fact that in April it defended the Free-Handers’ campaign of blaming immigration for COVID.\textsuperscript{67}

Media

The year 2020 was the year that the Independent Press Standards Organisation (IPSO) finally published its Guidance on (press) Reporting of Muslims and Islam.\textsuperscript{68}

\textsuperscript{68} The full guidance document can be found at https://www.ipso.co.uk/member-publishers/guidance-for-journalists-and-editors/guidance-on-reporting-of-muslims-and-islam/.
It was a long time coming too: by the time that it was published in November 2020 it was almost a year late. The focus on accurate, balanced, evidence-based reporting that resisted the temptation to generalise, used visual content and headlines judiciously, and deployed measured language that was free from ‘prejudicial or pejorative language about an individual’s religion’, ought to be welcome. However, the guidance has been criticised as amounting to a ‘toothless tiger’. This has largely to do with the nature of IPSO itself - a voluntary body chosen by the press editors themselves, product of a compromise between introducing (more) rigorous press standards and maintaining editorial and journalistic freedom. But the transparent attempt to pre-empt criticism from the defenders of ‘freedom of speech’ is too obvious to miss, with prescriptive guidance kept to a minimum and prefaced with statements such as …neither IPSO nor the Code seeks to specify or limit the language that journalists can use to report on Islam or Muslims in the UK. This would curtail freedom of expression and the ability of the press to challenge, scrutinise, and debate…

Clause 12 (journalists must avoid prejudicial or pejorative reference to an individual’s religion … and must only publish details of an individual’s religion … if it is genuinely relevant to the story) should not be interpreted as preventing criticism merely because, as is inescapable, many individuals subscribe to that faith. Were it otherwise, the freedom of the press to engage in discussion, criticism and debate about religious ideas and practices would be restricted.

It is not a coincidence that mainstream figures who in the past have questioned the utility of the term ‘Islamophobia’ and campaigned against the efforts to adopt an official definition as ‘anti-Muslim racism’ are also leading the charge against media regulation. The way that the IPSO guidance on reporting on Muslims is deflected once through the prism of ‘freedom of speech’ underlines a growing tendency to use the latter trope to lessen the impact of interventions against Islamophobia in the media. What has changed, however, is the embedding of the ‘freedom of speech’ discourse as a barricade to any effort to penalise expressions of hate and wilful discrimination that have been proven to cause distress or even mental and physical harm to so many individuals and communities across the country.

Figure 8: Evidence of the CfMM’s effective work in holding British press to account when it comes to instances of inaccurate reporting in relation to Muslim communities and Islam.

How much the UK needs both the clarity of a legally adopted definition of Islamophobia and clear guidelines about media reporting on Muslims and Islam has been underlined during the period of the first lockdown in the spring and early summer of 2020. In addition to the by now familiar concerns about representations of Muslims in the media (disproportionate focus on Muslims when reporting in terrorism, use of generalising language and sensational cliché imagery, influence of media representations in mainstream public perceptions of Islam and Muslim communities, etc.), the COVID-19 pandemic provided new excuses and outlets for negative coverage of Muslims in the UK media. The continuing important work carried out by the Centre for Media Monitoring (CfMM) in terms of scrutinising standards of reporting in media has already unearthed a significant body of negative coverage and false reporting regarding Muslims. The CfMM has taken action against these incidents and has scored significant victories. For example, in the case of The Daily Mail’s and The Sun’s reporting in June 2020 that ‘Pakistan was the origin for HALF of Britain’s imported COVID cases’, IPSO found that the headline represented a ‘clear failure by the newspaper to take care not to publish misleading or distorted information’. This was because the claim could only be held accurate in relation to the month of June (30 cases in total as the amended headline in The Sun stressed) and not across the entire period of the pandemic as the original article appeared to claim. The catalogue of press infractions identified by the CfMM is very long – and, encouragingly, so is the list of the cases where media outlets were forced to issue apologies and corrective statements in response. The problem, however, remains: the review process is protracted, published apologies remain disturbingly low-key, and the entire operation is based on monitoring ex post facto and damage-limitation precisely because voluntary self-regulation has simply not worked.

The coincidence of the first national lockdown with the month of Ramadan, and the sudden announcement of a series of local lockdown in the north of England on the eve of the festival of Eid al-Adha, in July-August gave rise to further negative coverage of Muslim communities in mainstream press. The Mail presented the Eid al-Adha celebration as ‘slaughter’ and ‘bloody sacrifice’, accompanying the charged language with imagery deliberate chosen to provoke instinctive aversion and thus reinforce the stereotypical view of Islam as brutal and Muslims as culturally regressive.75

Still the problem was not confined to tabloid journalism. The story about imported cases from Pakistan had in fact originated in the conservative broadsheet The Telegraph a few days earlier. Meanwhile in April The Times used disturbingly allusive language that suggested a link between Ramadan and a rise in the COVID caseload across the UK.76 The article was reported to IPSO by the CfMM, and was subsequently revised to reflect that it was based on speculation and prevention. Yet, when read together with its subtitle (“The [British Medical Association] has called for an inquiry into why people from ethnic minorities seem disproportionately affected”), its message remained problematic as it continued to suggest that Muslim cultural and religious practices were to blame for the disproportionately high number of COVID cases and related deaths among BAME communities.

Justice System

It is revealing of how far a strain of mainstream ‘Islamophobia scepticism’ has become completely normalised in the UK that the new head of the country’s discrimination watchdog - the Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) - was opposed to efforts to legally define Islamophobia.77 Baroness Kishwer Falkner, a member of the UK Upper Chamber, had publicly expressed her opposition to the 2018 definition of Islamophobia proposed by the All-Party Parliamentary Group on British Muslims: appearing in front of the parliamentary Home Affairs Committee, she claimed that the definition was overgeneralised, too wide and lacking in precision, unenforceable, and too heavy-handed, claiming that because of her views she had been a victim of ‘reverse Islamophobia’ (‘told that I am not sufficiently Muslim’).78

The EHRC attracted the wrong kind of headlines in relation to discrimination on a further number of occasions during 2020. As mentioned earlier (see ‘Politics’), it eventually dropped its original plan to lead an investigation of Islamophobia in the Conservative Party. In November, the same body decided not to take action against the Tory MP Michael Fabricant, who responded to criticism from Miqdaad Versi, director of CfMM at the Muslim Council of Britain, with a tweet mentioning ‘Anglo-Muslim relations’ and the allusion to an incompatibility between (Muslim) religion and English/British ethnic identity.79 At around the same time, one of EHRC’s board members came under increasing scrutiny for his social media activity that suggested endorsing controversial views on homophobia, racism, and Islam. This bit of news came to join a stream of other reports regarding newly appointed commissioners to the EHRCC by the equalities minister Liz Truss. Truss has deservedly been censured for her insensitive and ‘negligent’ approach to the very brief she is holding, making a number of key appointments to the watchdog known for their expressed divisive and politically charged views. Evidence of their indirect endorsement of views expressed by controversial figures such as the recently deceased philosopher Roger Scruton or Douglas Murray, raised considerable alarm that the ideologically shifting composition of the UK equalities watchdog was likely to affect its ability to intervene decisively and take constructive action against all forms of discrimination.

As 2020 draws to an end, it is still not clear when and how the government will embark on the long-awaited review of its controversial counter-terrorism programme Prevent. News, however, that the frontrunner for leading the review was William Shawcross - a person closely linked with the Henry Jackson Society that is well-known for its controversial views on Islam and its protracted battles against UK Muslim organisations - cast a grave shadow on the prospects of meaningful change emerging from this review. The securitisation of Muslim otherness fostered by counter-extremism and -terrorism has crept deeper into more and more everyday life settings, from street policing and airport security checks to education (see above) and the workplace. Research published by the Centre for Research and Evidence on Security Threats (CREST) on Muslim perceptions of policing and extremism has generated significant controversy because it claims to have encountered much higher-than-expected levels of support - and less negative concern - for Prevent among Muslim respondents. The report’s findings have been picked up by the Commissioner for Countering Extremism as putative evidence of the government’s success in its counter-extremism strategy; they have also been strategically and selectively used to refute criticisms of Prevent by Muslim organisations in the UK. The findings of the project do not question the well-evidenced view that Prevent has had a disproportionately negative effect on Muslim communities. In fact, yet another piece of research published in 2020 in relation to the health and care settings underlines the urgent need for reviewing Prevent as part of a strategy of combatting institutional racism and fighting against Islamophobia.

For some time now social media have been by far the most significant source of misinformation about Islam and Muslims, in both volume and influence, in the UK as in all other countries. Given how pervasive social media platforms have become in our private and public lives alike, their role in disseminating and reinforcing broader racial, religious, and cultural stereotypes about Islam and Muslims cannot possibly be exaggerated.92 In 2020, however, the pandemic tipped the balance much further: during the lockdown, use of social media not only soared in quantitative terms but also transformed the landscape of content consumption and production. During and after the first UK lockdown, more than a third of the UK population reported significant increase in use of the internet - and of social media in particular - mostly for information and news, entertainment, and social interaction. Although the picture varies significantly across generations, the increase in use patterns applies fairly uniformly across the entire demographic sample.

All this means that, especially during the peak of the first wave and the lockdown, social media played the most egregious role in disseminating and amplifying misinformation campaigns claiming that individuals and communities with Muslim background were allegedly flouting social distancing rules and acting as super-spreaders. It was in social media that all sorts of conspiracy theories originated and gained traction - and predictably anti-Chinese, anti-Muslim, and anti-Semitic content topped the depressing online misinformation charts.

Unsurprisingly the far right - globally, nationally, and locally - has exploited the pandemic in order to increase the resonance and reach of its message in the midst of the crisis by turning COVID into a platform for further discrediting its key targets. Muslims were typically presented as spreading the virus faster whether as part of an alleged conspiracy against western 'Christian' countries (something that Daesh is known to have called for in India but which the far right weaponised and turned into an allusion of a worldwide jihad) or by disrespecting safety measures (again seized by far-right sources by circulating images of prayer crowds in mosques that were either doctored or taken before COVID rules came into effect). Social media platforms have increased their monitoring of the published material, removing offensive content and banning users from using the services. For example, stories about a 'secret mosque' in Birmingham or about Muslim prayers flouting lockdown restrictions on religious services in Shropshire were removed but only after the original content and imagery had been allowed to circulate and has been widely reproduced. Twitter, which has been working closely with the Cross Government Working Group on Anti-Muslim Hatred to target and conduct research on the propagation of bigoted anti-Muslim content under the guise of COVID (mis)information, finally permanently banned Katie Hopkins from its platform in June for serially violating its policy on posting hate content. Before switching off, however, Hopkins asked her followers to keep in touch via her Instagram account - a useful reminder that social media remains a network of interconnected spaces that work together to construct reality and massify public information, where platform-specific restrictions are of limited effect. In fact, recent research has shown that Instagram has been the fastest-growing social media platform in 2020, with its uses extending from entertainment and social interaction to opinion and information.

Central Figures in the Islamophobia Network

At the launch event of the far-right Alliance of Free Speech in February, the organisers awarded a special ‘Hearts of Oak’ award for free speech to Amy Dalla Mura. Dalla Mura was the candidate in the constituency of Broxtowe for the far-right English Democrats in the December 2019 elections and ended up in jail for harassing and threatening one of her co-candidates, the prominent and vocal ex-Conservative anti-Brexit politician Anna Soubry. The notoriety of her behaviour notwithstanding, Dalla Mura secured a rather underwhelming 0.8% of the vote; yet, she has somehow managed to become a cherished figure for the far right in the UK.

It is customary for this section of the report to focus on those individuals and groups, typically associated with the radical and/or far right, who have used their prominent public role (in politics, traditional and social media, culture, etc.) to promote and normalise extreme anti-Muslim views and stereotypes, spread fear and suspicion, and/or distinguish themselves in becoming amplifiers of disinformation. In some respects, this has been our version of awarding mocking ‘prizes’ to those who have contributed to fostering, embedding, and/or normalising anti-Muslim racism in the UK. However extraordinary 2020 was, the stars of the Islamophobic platform in Britain have remained strikingly similar. In fact, some of them appeared on stage during the February launch of the new UK populist formation Alliance of Free Speech Activists on 28 February 2020: Stephen Yaxley-Lennon (aka Tommy Robinson), the celebrity YouTuber Carl Benjamin (aka Sargon of Akkad), and Catherine Blaiklock, the former UKIP politician and founder of the Brexit Party. A lot can be said about each of them, but Robinson in particular has once again excelled in Islamophobic notoriety. Over the years he has been attracting near-constant notorious publicity for his political mésalliance with UKIP, his imprisonment as a self-proclaimed martyr for free speech, and his habitual reinvention as resourceful agent provocateur of the British radical populist right. This year too he worked on every possible front to promote and spread a divisive Islamophobic agenda - with his Alliance of Free Speech as an attempt to unite the fragmented forces of the UK far right; with his incessant work in promoting conspiracies and disinformation about the behaviour of Muslims during the national lockdown; with his call for a protest march against ‘Muslim rape gangs’ outside the parliament in August; or with his cameo appearance at the so-called

However, there is a very different informal ‘network’ that has for a long time been disrupting the battle against Islamophobia in the UK. This is not a network that is associated with the Islamophobic far/radical right but is situated politically at the very heart of the British political mainstream. It has no stars or personality cults either; its strength lies in the attritional cumulative effects of its discourses, publications, reports, public events, and high-profile campaigns directed at efforts to combat institutional Islamophobia in the UK. Its apostles do not use openly racist or bigoted tropes. They do not shatter taboos with provocative speech acts or behaviours. Instead, they are at home deploying subtle attenuation by choosing softer targets - whether political correctness or alleged censorship of freedom of expression or, more recently, ‘cancel culture’ and even the fabled ‘right to offend’. When two years ago the UK came close to acquiring a legally binding definition of Islamophobia proposed by a cross-party parliamentary group as ‘anti-Muslim racism’, they rejected it on the grounds that it allegedly restricted the freedom to criticise Islam and misleadingly presented ‘Muslims’ as a ‘racial’ group.108 (see above) The ‘network’ is full of respectable mainstream figures, working in or for important mainstream organisations, and expressing arguments that, while provocative and controversial, are very different from the hateful and deliberately divisive pronouncements of, say, the founders of the Alliance of Freedom of Speech.109 And yet … while the anti-Muslim hatred of the latter is almost transparent and crude, the more subtle dissenting voices of the former have contributed far more to the mainstreaming of Islamophobic tropes in the public sphere. Using the mantra of ‘free speech’, the actor-turn-activist Laurence Fox recently criticised the decision to cancel a book contract by the controversial journalist Julie Burchill (who, in turn, had presumably thought she was expressing her sacred freedom of expression when she equated being a Muslim to ‘worshipping a paedophile’110) by calling Islamophobia ‘a lie and … a meaningless word scrabble of rubbish’. Alongside the horrific discursive and performative excesses emanating from the populist, radical, and extreme right, it is this ongoing embedding of Islamophobia (as well as other discriminatory and racist tropes) into otherwise mainstream discourses that deserves much closer scrutiny for its cumulative effect on normalising anti-Muslim prejudice in contemporary Britain.

Observed Civil Society and Political Initiatives to Counter Islamophobia

For the kind of year that was 2020, positive initiatives to counter Islamophobia on the local and national level deserve even more effusive praise and place of honour.

Civil society organisations have continued their invaluable research, public interventions, and initiatives - more needed than ever at a time of enforced silence and stillness, reduced visibility and contact. It is no surprise that organisations such as the Muslim Council of Britain, Tell MAMA, Muslim Engagement and Development (MEND), and HOPE Not Hate have continued to be at the very forefront of the everyday battle against Islamophobia - producing evidence-based knowledge and positive counter-narratives, holding power to account, exposing misinformation and negative stereotypes, protecting Muslim individuals and communities, and together informing the wider public about the corrosive effect of nationalism and racism on community cohesion.

One political initiative that deserves particular mention this year is the adoption of the new hate bill legislation by the Scottish Parliament just before the end of the year. The Edinburgh parliament has been investigating Islamophobia since 2018, courtesy of a cross-party parliamentary group put together by the Labour MSP Anas Sarwar in response to growing anti-Muslim hatred in Scotland. Even if the Scottish hate crime bill has not had the easiest of runs, having been criticised as ‘authoritarian’ and restrictive in terms of freedom of speech by some, and as not strong enough in its provisions by others, it remains a landmark piece of legislation and a decisive step - both real and symbolic - in the direction of empowering authorities to fight against any form of hate crime.

The catalogue of civil society initiatives against Islamophobia has been inspiring long and more varied and resourceful in 2020 than ever before. The following indicative list does not do justice to the initiatives but is intended to celebrate the energy and ingenuity of efforts to challenge Islamophobia in the UK even in the midst of a pandemic and a national lockdown:

- The imaginative and fruitful contribution of so many individuals and organisations (over 250 in total) to this year’s month-long Islamophobia Awareness Week (IAM2020) in November, an annual symbolic container of a wide range of events combatting anti-Muslim hatred that this year had to be re-invented but lost none of its energy or importance in the process.
- MACFEST, a festival celebrating Muslim arts and culture that was put together by Qaisra Shahraz, as an attempt to overcome the scars from the 2017 Manchester Arena terror attack, was held in January 2020, having grown into a major cultural event for the city lasting fifteen days; plans for the 2021 festival were well underway at the time of writing this report.\(^ {119}\)

Conclusion and Policy Recommendations

The 2019 report on Islamophobia in the UK highlighted the urgent need to ‘shift the balance towards inoculating society vis-à-vis disinformation and hate narratives.’121 The ongoing pandemic has given a very different topicality to any mention of ‘inoculation’ at the end of the tumultuous 2020 – yet, the basic premise of redoubling efforts to make people and communities less receptive to Islamophobic and more broadly racist currents remains even more true, relevant, and urgent today. Islamophobia has deep roots in UK politics and society that go well beyond any particular party. They also extend - no doubt in different forms and intensity but still … - across extreme, radical, populist, and mainstream political and social spaces. Islamophobia remains encrypted in public attitudes to identity, sovereignty, and security. It remains woven into all spheres of public and private life, off- and online. It has also become pervasive, routinised, normalised, and detoxified - almost invisible and difficult to pinpoint, wrapped into cosy mainstream narratives about ‘freedom of speech’, legitimised through mainstream channels of political and cultural authority. Put bluntly, it has taken hold, propagating much faster and wider than even the most concerted efforts to counter and/or eliminate it. Only if it is confronted as a mainstream problem - in its institutional and everyday forms - can the long-term upward trend be effectively and sustainably reversed.

In response to what happened in 2020, the following action areas are identified:

• continuous pressure to government and authorities to accept a legally binding definition of Islamophobia;
• reframing of the public debate on Islamophobia by focusing as much on its institutional ‘mainstream’ drivers and spaces as on its exceptional and ‘extreme’ manifestations, typically associated with the far right;
• more accurate, agile, and nuanced recording of hate crime that accounts for the complex intersectionality of racial, religious, ethnic, and gender discrimination;

monitoring social media platforms more effectively by deploying technological and legislative instruments to trace online users who are producing and/or disseminating content but are currently hiding behind anonymity;

• effective review and revision of the government’s counter-terrorism strategy, with critical feedback from civil society/grassroots organisations, a wide range of professional practitioners in all settings (education, health, workplace, etc.), as well as community leaders;

• promoting an understanding of Islamophobia in the UK as an expression of a broader dynamic fed by broader racial, social, and cultural prejudices;

• robust scrutiny and meaningful regulation of traditional media, accompanied by more robust official guidelines and more effective intervention powers by regulators and relevant watchdogs;

• active measures to encourage a culturally sensitive workplace that promotes gender, race, and religious equality;

• adequately resourced campaigns to enhance the safety and well-being of Muslim communities and their important spaces (especially mosques and cultural centres);

• effective assistance to civil society organisations to enhance their constructive input in the process of generating a range of counter-narratives about Islam and Muslims in contemporary Britain;

• stronger pressure on social media platforms to improve their systems of monitoring of hate content and employ more robust definitions of unacceptable online behaviour; and

• the need to continue to foster international co-operation in the fight against hate crime, disinformation, and extremism, especially in relation to online hate crime.

Chronology

• January 2020: Muslim community in Rotherham, south Yorkshire launch neighbourhood protection groups in response to the growing mobilisation and intimidation tactics used by local far-right organisations.

• 01.01.2020: Racial slurs are sprayed on walls adjacent to the North Brixton Islamic Cultural Centre in London.

• 24.02.2020: A new far-right informal campaign group under the name ‘Alliance of Free Speech’ is launched, featuring Stephen Yaxley-Lennon (known as Tommy Robinson), Carl Benjamin, and UKIP founder Catherine Blaiklock.

• 02.03.2020: The Conservative Party suspends an undisclosed number of members for posting offensive online comments, following damning dossier of evidence submitted by HOPE Not Hate.
• 09.03.2020: The Labour Party suspends Trevor Phillips, former chair of the Equality and Human Rights Commission, over Islamophobia claims.
• 17.03.2020: A mosque and community centre in Birmingham is targeted with offensive graffiti.
• 12.05.2020: The Conservative Party itself backtracks from its original promise of an enquiry into Islamophobia, opting instead of a broader – and diluted – focus on ‘discrimination’. On the same day, the Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) announces that it will not proceed with its original plan to launch an independent enquiry into allegations of Islamophobia in the ranks of the Conservative Party.
• 27.05.2020: Raffia Arshad becomes the first hijab-wearing Muslim woman appointed as court judge in the UK.
• 20.06.2020: Twitter permanently suspends the account of the far-right agitator Katie Hopkins.
• July 2020: UK tabloid (Sun, Daily Mail) and broadsheet (Telegraph) newspapers misleadingly report that half of the imported cases of COVID-19 came from Pakistan. The story was condemned as misleading by IPSO in December 2020, prompting the newspapers to issue a correction.
• 27.07.2020: Arson attacks against the mosque on Aylsham Road in Norwich.
• 31.07.2020: Craig Whittaker, Conservative MP for the Calder Valley, claims that the majority of people violating COVID lockdown restrictions are from BAME – and Muslim, in particular - communities.
• 02.08.2020: British tabloid Daily Mail reports Eid al-Adha celebrations as a ‘slaughter’ and a ‘bloody sacrifice’.
• 01.11.2020: Tommy Robinson is arrested for violating COVID restrictions after he organised and attended a rally in Hyde Park, London.
• 09.11.2020: The Independent Press Standards Office (IPSO) publishes its long-overdue Guidance on Reporting of Muslims and Islam. Upon its release it is criticised for being like a ‘toothless tiger’.
By gathering 37 local scholars, experts, and civil society activists specialized in racism and human rights, the sixth edition of the European Islamophobia Report addresses a still timely and politically important issue. All 31 country reports included in this book follow a unique structure that is convenient, first, for comparing countries and, second, for selected readings on a particular topic such as politics, employment, or education with regard to Islamophobia across Europe.

The present report investigates in detail the underlying dynamics that directly or indirectly contribute to the rise of anti-Muslim racism in Europe. This extends from Islamophobic statements spread in national media to laws and policies that restrain the fundamental rights of European Muslim citizens and threaten the whole of society. As a result, the European Islamophobia Report 2020 discusses the impact of anti-Muslim racism on human rights such as freedom of association, freedom of speech, and religious freedom, and the state of law in Europe.

This sixth edition of our report highlights how the COVID-19 pandemic has affected the mobilization of Islamophobia, and how states like Austria and France have implemented their anti-Muslim legislation and measures to threaten Muslim civil society. The 31 country reports demonstrate how governments and mainstream media participate in reproducing discourses that put the fundamental rights of European citizens in jeopardy and how one can counteract these developments.

This compendium of useful insights and data aims to provide European policymakers, institutions, and NGOs with recommendations on how to tackle anti-Muslim racism in Europe systematically.
